First generation college students

We are all here striving for the same goal — a college education. But how did we get here? What roads have we taken to get to where we are?

First generation college students are students who were the first in their families to achieve the elusive title of "college student." There are many added pressures and expectations put on these students. Their parents scream, "Go to college," but often times lack the knowledge of how to get there. It's like handing someone an address with no road map.

First generation students at the University of Massachusetts were asked to share their experiences.

Freshman Paul Fonseca said, "I feel that I have to set the example for my little brother because he looks up to me. I find myself second–guessing many of my decisions if I know my little brother is watching."

Many parents of first generation college students often want their children to have what they don't have.

"I am here to accomplish all the goals my mother didn't reach. I really have no choice but to be here," said junior Nancy DePina.

This added pressure can often force a student to choose between their parents' wants and dreams and their own wants and dreams. After all, college is not for everyone. Different students who are faced with the pressures of being a first year college student deal with the situation in different ways.

Senior Nikia Davis has learned to deal with the added pressures. "I accepted the responsibility a long time ago, so I've learned to deal with it in a positive way."

Sophomore Jeff Belizaire keeps his faith in God as he is the first in his family to navigate through these unfamiliar waters we call college. "Everything is possible by God, therefore I place God ahead of everything."

DePina sometimes finds it a necessity to distinguish between her goals and her mother's goals. "I've had to learn to separate my wants and dreams from my mother's expectations and dreams."

"The big question still remains — are first generation college students at an advantage or disadvantage?"

The big question still remains — are first generation college students at an advantage or disadvantage? Are these added pressures too much when coupled with the pressures of a course load and the sometimes confusing social life of a large university?

Belizaire feels that it's a double–edged sword. "It has been both an advantage and a disadvantage. I had to grow up faster than most other youths because I had a lot more on my shoulders, but the pressure forced me to perform to the best of my abilities."

DePina found it harder to deal with administrative things. "It might have been easier for me to deal with things such as the SAT's, college applications, and the financial aid process if my parents were college educated. But my younger brothers can now use me as a resource, so I guess that's positive."

Fonseca is still adjusting to his new environment. "It's still early in my college career, I'm still trying to organize my school work and social situations."

"It was a disadvantage at first because I had no one to lead me, but it's an advantage now because I have an opportunity to lead others," Davis said.

There is no question that these students are a little more knowledgeable than others. After living the experience, they are definitely people others can look up to. These students are trailblazers in every sense. The knowledge they possess can help a lot of young people.

"Establish a good relationship with God and keep your faith in God. You can accomplish anything, " Belizaire said.

Davis suggests, "Use your situation to make you a stronger person."

DePina encourages young people to "enjoy the experience of learning from your trials and tribulations. There is nothing like living the experience yourself!"

First generation college students are hopefully a dying breed. Hopefully, one day everyone can grow up in a household where at least one parent is college educated. Until then, we can follow the lead of our trailblazers.

They have somehow found their way to "University Ave." without that road map.

Insurrection
The Dilemma of the Free Negro

Part two of a two–part series.

I can recall my previous three years at this "breeding facility" and can tell you the dismay I faced as a black man. I too, have fallen victim to the ills of smoking, drinking, and promiscuous behavior. I have understood the trials and tribulations needed to receive an 8 by 11 piece of paper covered with calligraphy and the racist State Seal (that's an article for another week), that bears witness to my having graduated college, like the 1964 Civil Rights Act exemplifying our rights as citizens in this much–revered slave holding colony.

I have witnessed many practices and policies of this bureaucracy, as a former Black Student Union President and SGA Executive officer, that reflect the politics of the "real world" (I guess they helped to foster my nationalist and radical philosophies). I often ponder what our ancestors would say if they saw our inadequate habits today in 1998.

With our baby boom, high–school and college drop–out rates, people who conform to Caucasians, and the lack of unity and community, our situation is not pleasant. This reaches out to all of my brothers and sisters; from the suburbs to urban America, from the conference rooms of Fortune 500 companies to the enclosed cells of prisons, from the streets of New York and Boston, to the roads of Haiti and South Africa. As of right now, we remain figurative pawns in white America's strategic game of chess. Since the first European boats landed on the shores of America in the 14th and 15th centuries, and ever since the landing of the missionaries into the villages and empires of our Mother Continent we have been subject to evil deeds.

"Tens of millions of black men, women, and children died at the hands of European merchants and captains during the Middle Passage. The worse genocide of a people in the story of our planet. This is disturbing, my brothers and sisters. "

Kenny Lacoste

We still remain second and third class citizens, as long as there are those who control our will, and we inundate ourselves with the vile depictions in all media, sports, and in the workforce. A young lady asked some disturbing questions in one of my classes last week. She asked the professor, and I quote, "Why did blacks stay in slavery so long? And why did they continue to stay in this position at their own will? Did they do anything?" Think about this for a moment, if you will. This wasn't just disturbing, because she wasn't familiar with famous insurrections and rebellions; but are we really "truly" free from slavery? Are we doing anything to correct our current predicament? Because we are, after 130 years, still feeling the overall effects of antebellum, the Middle Passage, and the cruel laws that protected slavery and its perpetrators.

Tens of millions of black men, women, and children died at the hands of European merchants and captains during the Middle Passage. The worse genocide of a people in the story of our planet. This is disturbing, my brothers and sisters. Members of our family tree were thrown from ships, died in the mutinies, died in bondage, and were killed because of fake accusations by white Europeans and Americans, to the extent that it is still overwhelming to us, today.

I recently saw the movie "Titanic" on video cassette a month ago (My mother is one who enjoyed the movie enough to buy it). But in any event, I sat through the nearly three hours of this film and engulfed myself in philosophical thought. It's amazing how white America can be so "tragically moved" by a cinematic production of an event that in no way accumulates the anger, sadness, and pain of slavery, or for that matter, the lynching of blacks, murder of black babies, or the raping and killing of our women by figures such as Christopher Columbus, and the Spanish Conquistadors.

Did you know the first individuals to die on the Titanic were black men?

Yes, the engineers and steersmen in the bottom of the vessel were all males of African decent. Amazing is the sacrifice of historical facts to make a blockbuster movie.

So I ask again, are we really in a position of freedom? Millions of black people in the United States live below the poverty line. About one third of our black men are in prison. Millions our black women are teenage mothers, and we refuse to detect a problem! The number–one killer of black men between the ages of 12–24, is ourselves. Statistics hardly lie. And unfortunately these statistics are continually rising.

I recently learned that the American African's freedom came as a result of concession. This is true throughout the history of the country. The Emancipation Proclamation was a decree issued to blacks guaranteeing freedom at the end of the Civil War, and ultimately ending slavery in states that went to war with the Union.

Is this all soaking in yet? Are my brothers and sisters reevaluating their position and goals? Or are we to remain in this white man's game of chess, as pawns, to be utilized and ultimately deemed extinct.

I am of the school of thought that, "To obtain freedom Is to embody struggle, sacrifice, and strength".

We, as members of the African Diaspora, have been familiar with these three dimensions. It is our duty to exercise them. So let us retrieve our torches and guide our own destinies.

Hotep and Umoja.

Time is running out!

The new session of education has officially begun here at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst. All the parents have returned home, the boxes are unpacked, posters hung, rooms arranged, new friends met, and old friends reunited. By all accounts, the status quo remains in place. The financial institution is still encouraging long term student debt, the athletic teams will once again take the fields, instructors prepare the year's lessons and students get set for "the time of their lives."

But what about the lessons of last year?

What have we truly learned? For the majority of our students, the ceremony of the new academic year is one that is quite unceremonious. For the truly unfortunate, the start of the new year begins at home. For what ever reasons, the challenge of last year did not allow some students to return to campus this year as enrolled students. The question of why is prompted by the reality that their academic careers my be at an end (to be addressed in subsequent article). Those of our students who do return to campus face a far too common ritual some call the "Whitmore Shuffle."

This is the dance of emergency financial aid requests, academic withdrawal and probation petitions, appointments with advisors, a search for last second paper–work, and enduring long hours in lines on a quest to find the origins of some mysterious bill and a host of other trials. The systematic gauntlet of the Whitmore shuffle finds most students dancing alone when the music stops.

Certainly some of our students do begin the year as enrolled students, but in what academic shape do they return? Are they prepared to succeed in the world outside these walls? Do we question their GPAs, internships, co–ops, resumes, networking of interpersonal skills, etc.? For the very few who matriculate from the University, the applause are far too quiet. While it is but one of many trials we face, few will have a more profound impact on our lives.

Those who are genuinely concerned with their performance and

"Your success tomorrow depends on your diligence today, and more importantly, wanting success is chasing and capturing the gold."

the quality of their lives invariably are caught between too little praise for what they do accomplish and too–low expectations of what they could achieve. The majority of our people never attend an institute of "higher learning" and a not many of our people will ever graduate with a college degree of any kind. Where does this leave us? Should we be satisfied with some students attending college, considering that about only half graduate from high school? I would guess that those who were never afforded the opportunity and luxury of attending college would opt for higher standards.

No one, and certainly not I, would suggest that college students do not succeed by their own blood, sweat, and tears. However, are we achieving at the rates we should, or even could?

I was approached by a first year student who asked me, "Aren't you James Callahan, that guy who always wants everyone to get 4.0's?" I replied, "That sounds like me." The student then replied, "What makes you think that everyone can be successful?" I did not resound that the seeds of all knowledge exist in their genetic make–up, and I did not explain that all the education in this and every university gains its roots from the universal wisdom of our ancestors. I also did not report that academic prowess is not a measure of intellect but of study and exposure. I did not conclude by telling him that education is just a tool that affords one with opportunities, nor did I present the fact that his time here at the university would shape virtually every event for the rest of his life.

I do believe all these things to be true. Here are many things I could have said, and all of which I wish I had. But what I did say was, "Do not get caught up in trying to have the time of your life and end up living a life of the times!"

Your success tomorrow depends on your diligence today, and more importantly, wanting success is chasing and capturing the gold. Education is the critical key; it will not give you happiness, but will allow you the means to achieve happiness. Do not be a case of others wanting more from you than you want for yourself. The reality of it is that conditions have not changed. In the realm of accountability, we may not be solely responsible for our current situation, but we must take full responsibility for alleviating our circumstance.

Keep it real — what you are doing, positive or negative, will only affect you. Next semester you may not be around to read the Black Affairs Page.

Attention black people
Business and technology
We must get in!

As we approach the fourth week of classes, many of you may be feeling overwhelmed with your classes and the problem of choosing a major. When you look through the undergraduate catalog you may feel even more confused and worried. Perhaps you have a major, but you are not satisfied! Listen! Don't despair! There is something that is pertinent to us as black students and it needs to be understood...

"Through this very university it is possible to gain the knowledge and techniques that the field of the future entails."

Lanell James

Black business and technology is a field that we should consider when we picture ourselves in the future of America. Studies show that Information technology is growing rapidly and stripping all other industries of economic growth. It is the field of the future, and as a community of strong black people and students we need to put ourselves in a position to be a part of the economy of the next millennium. Together, it is necessary that we be the leaders in our schools in this area of interest. Also, while our numbers increase and high enrollment continues in America's universities and colleges, we need to direct our attention to this field in particular.

However, we must understand that blacks have been systematically overlooked in this field! For many years the face of a black man or black woman were nowhere to be found. However, this must change! We must continue to be competitive! And even when it seems that our merit and knowledge are questioned, and positions are denied, we need to be even more competitive!

When I look around me, I see a way that this can happen. I see a path where we can funnel our energies — education. It continues to be our tool to combat the status quo. Through this very university it is possible to gain the knowledge and techniques that the field of the future entails. So, when you students want to choose a career, do not exclude business and science! I encourage you to walk up to the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, the College of Engineering, and the School of Management and see what they are like. Also, meet with your advisor and see what classes you can take that will get you started.

Additionally, if you are able to access the Internet, I strongly urge and recommend that you check out these web sites and find out what our community is doing in this field: www.tbwt.com (The Black World Today), www.blackbusiness.com, www.everythingblack.com, and www.blackfacts.com.

Most importantly, I would like you to keep your eyes open and realize that these fields are not easy. There will be things that will happen that will show you the injustices and prejudices that exist, but you are the only one that knows who you are. Here's a little advice that the late Martin Luther King, Jr. would give, "We must not allow any force to make us feel like we don't count. Maintain a sense of dignity and respect..." So don't lose sight of the bigger picture, and please be strong!

RUSH HOUR
Directed by Brett Ratner with Jackie Chan, Chris Tucker, Philip Baker Hall
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Part of the sheer enjoyment of Jackie Chan's imported Hong Kong movies — Rumble in the Bronx and First Strike among them — is listening to the horribly dubbed dialogue and making fun of the gloriously inept plots. But these amateur qualities aside, the films also display the comic gift that makes Chan one of the world's greatest living physical comedians, second only to the Baywatch lifeguards.

Often compared more to Keaton (that's Buster, not Michael) and Charlie Chaplin, than martial arts peers such as Bruce Lee, Chan mixes incredible, ballet-like flexibility with a self-effacing, goofy, comic tone that sometimes can generate an adrenaline rush equaled by few other film artists.

Sure, he's getting a little old, but it doesn't show on screen. Chan can still scale walls with a three-step jump and clear a pool house with a couple of cues. And now, he's finally made another American movie. In fact, it might as well be his first, because the '80's flick Cannonball Run was about as memorable as the Pogo Ball.

Rush Hour, under the direction of "filmmaker" Brett Ratner, doesn't show quite enough of the unbelievable athleticism of Chan's stunts. Ratner simply isn't talented enough to compliment Jackie's art. Instead, it gets some laughs and scores with a screenplay that is intentionally, rather than dumbly (blindly), funny. It's polished and swift, playing upon the opposites-attract personalities of Chan and Chris Tucker. If only the screenwriters, who basically copy the Lethal Weapon formula, had written the latest Lethal Weapon.

Chan is funny when he sings and dances to "War" and performs such other silly antics, but Tucker is the real find here. An Eddie Murphy/Chris Rock incarnate, Tucker can be painfully obnoxious (as in The Fifth Element) or painfully funny (as in Money Talks). That latter film was also helmed by Ratner, and it's obvious that the director loves to put the camera on Tucker and let the comedian spit his rapid-fire scoffings.

Take your soap vixen quiz

Hey ladies and gents! Those of you who know me have become all too aware of my infatuation with daytime soap's bad girls. What's not to love about gals like Carly Roberts ("General Hospital") who are willing to do whatever it takes to get what they want? Even if you hate their guts, you have to admire their spunk. Secretly, I've always wanted to be a vixen (in spirit, not equipment wise) but unfortunately God has cursed me with a conscious. Sure, I've done my fair share of shameful deeds, which I won't rehash, but do I really have what it takes to be a vixen? More importantly, do you? That's the question of the day.

If you're a woman, chances are you've come across at least a dozen or so questionnaires while skimming through "Seventeen" magazine. You know, the ones that claim to be able to tell you whether or not your man is cheating on you, whether he still loves you, etc, etc. Well, this week I thought I'd see just how strong that inner vixen of yours is with a little questionnaire of my own making. Here goes:

1. You catch your man in bed with another woman, and of course they're oblivious to the fact that you're there. do you:

a) Slip some arsenic in their champagne while they're...ahem, busy.

b) Run home with your tail between your legs.

c) Kick open that door and bitch the two of them out.

2. You're at an elegant dinner party when your arch rival (a.k.a., the woman who is after your man) shows up wearing the exact same dress. Do you:

a) Lure her into one of the back rooms and lock her in there.

b) Just try to ignore her even though it's eating you up inside.

c) Oops...accidentally spill your glass of red wine all over the front of her dress. Either that or you could just publicly humiliate her. Casually ask her if she's pregnant, you know the drill.

3. You find yourself a little strapped for cash. Do you:

a) Seduce your married boss and then threaten to divulge the details of your sleazy little affair with his wife unless he gives you a raise.

b) Get a second job.

c) Find yourself a charming sugar daddy.

4. Your role model (fictional) would be someone like:

a) Sharon Stone's character in Basic Instinct

b) Scarlett O'Hara

c) Catwoman (that purr of hers is simply divine, not to mention the way she handles that whip)

5. You find yourself drawn to an already attached man. Do you:

a) Pursue him anyway. You could shamelessly fall into his lap and excuse yourself with a smile. Just blame it on a little too much bubbly.

b) Leave him alone. You don't, under any circumstances, mess with another woman's man. Even if it comes at the expense of your own needs.

c) Intimidate the hell out of his girlfriend. Play on her insecurities. Tease him with some not-so-subtle gestures of affection and hope that his girl becomes so insecure and jealous that she drives him away...and into your arms.

6. Which of the following is more important to you:

a) money

b) love

c) sex

7. You feel your man slipping away. Do you:

a) Tell him you're carrying his child (oldest trick in the book).

b) Be your usual passive-aggressive self and let him slip through your fingers.

c) Slip him some Viagra (the drug that Annie used on Gregory on "Sunset Beach").

Results: If you answered mostly a's: You might want to consider some psychiatric help. There's nothing wrong with being a bad girl but you're just too over the top. Vixen you most resemble: Annie on "Guiding Light"; Sheila on "Bold & the Beautiful."

Mostly b's: There's not a vindictive bone in your body. How sad! You're the Robin ("GH") of the real world.

Mostly c's: You're not a raving witch, but you have your moments. You're what we call the sympathetic vixen. I found myself in this category as well. Vixen you most resemble: Erica Kane on "All My Children."

Well, wasn't that fun. Now for a little soap news...

Rumor has it Kimberly McCullough (Robin) might be leaving "GH." Sniff...I don't know why this upsets me. Maybe I'm still reeling from Brenda's departure just a few weeks ago. I mean, Robin's probably my least favorite character on the show (if she doesn't keep her hands away from baby Michael I'm going to kill her myself). I guess I'm upset because she's been on the show forever. That and she's one of the few remaining links to the old school "GH" I grew up with.

Sink or Swim

Sink:

• The teen adventure on "GH." Of course I'm talking about the search for Emily's blackmailer. These teen stories are always a disaster and this one doesn't appear to be any different. Two quick comments: One, I'm not buying Emily's transformation into one of the world's premiere supermodels. Hello! The girl looks like she's ten. Second, could someone please give Tyler Christopher (Nik) a storyline that's worthy of his talent. The poor guy's spent the better half of two weeks pouting and following Emily around town. Let's see him tackle something a little more serious, maybe a relationship. I'm supposed to believe this guy can't get a date?

Treading Water:

Swim:

• Father Antonio on "SB." I'm in love with the triangle brewing between Antonio, Gabi and Ricardo. Talk about taboo. A priest in love with his brother's girlfriend? How fun! A special round of applause for the wardrobe people over at "Sunset" for keeping Father Antonio in next to nothing for the better half of last week. Ladies, the view is looking better and better over at "Sunset."

Getting to the core of hip–hop

When reading journalism, like any source of information, it is absolutely essential to digest given material with a grain of salt.

Now that my disclaimer has been sounded it is time to remove the filter and let the pure, unadulterated hip–hop flow. For those seeking info on the latest trends and chart– topping smashes in rap music, I am sorry to say that you will not find it here. These words are aimed towards the organic basement–beat fiends, the lyrical analysts, the turntable innovators, the loop junkies, the cunning metaphor hounds, the battle rhyme seekers, the crate diggers, the mic thieves ..you get the point.

David Katzoff

If you have ever written a rhyme on a napkin, kicked a freestyle by yourself, thought of a scratch routine in your head, tagged a piece while intoxicated or spent an indefinite amount of time at a record store, then these words are for you. If half of these concepts are foreign to you, I appreciate that you have made it this far and hopefully you can use the preceding paragraphs as a contact lens for your third eye.

As I continue on, I would like to direct my thoughts towards those who wake up and eat hip–hop for breakfast and notice that our portions have been decreasing. We have standards simply because we have passion. That is not to say that all true heads agree on everything, but fundamentally we must acknowledge that our culture has been approaching the crossroads.

Although there have been constant flashes of brilliance over the last few years, the saturation (and popularity) of the rap industry has ultimately depleted its authenticity; resulting in less and less of a daily dosage. And talent is hardly lacking! It is most frustrating when capable artists drop underachieving efforts. Credit this trend to the irresistible lure of materialism topics, combined with mediocre standards and a lack of effort. Underachievement is running rampant in hip–hop and those on the pulse of the culture are beginning to lose the beat.

The purpose of this diatribe is to address a plethora of issues affecting various aspects of underground hip–hop. A particular focus will be dissecting and debunking the music itself and providing a critical focus to all areas of interest. I will offer solutions for live shows, radio spots, magazines, web–sites, blend tapes, lyrics of the month, and on–campus activities and organizations attempting to strengthen our community.

I will also be encouraging aspiring hip–hop–ians at this university to share their talents. Whether it be written rhymes, tags, cuts or dorm–room freestyle sessions, we need to start unifying and capturing the realism that occurs each day at this school.

The seeds have been planted, and it is our job to cultivate them and watch them grow. Stay tuned...

Big Mac finally gets a chance to take it easy

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Mark McGwire is tired of hitting baseballs. Now it's time to hit the beach.

Yesterday, that was the destination of the 70-homer man, back in Southern California after carrying the burden of unreal expectations for six months and then achieving something few could have imagined.

"I'm like in awe of myself," McGwire said.

Why not? This year, everybody else in baseball played in his huge shadow.

"He's provided moment after moment after moment after moment," St. Louis Cardinals manager Tony La Russa said. "It's been unbelievable theater."

And now he'll steal some time for himself. Don't look for McGwire to be hawking shaving cream or pickup trucks, or having a book ghost-written, or to be spending time on the banquet circuit. "He's going to be real hard to find," La Russa said.

McGwire's needs are simple: He wants to spend a lot more time with his 10-year-old son, Matthew, who lives most of the year in California with McGwire's ex-wife. Maybe he'll get to tool around in the 1962 red Corvette which has been sitting in his garage since he broke Roger Maris' home run record.

And oh yes, he'll try to work on that pasty complexion. "I don't have a tan," McGwire said. "So they'll say, 'Who's the guy from the East Coast?'"

Of the numerous endorsement offers he's already received, McGwire said, "Nothing's really turning my crank."

"I won't allow anything to take me away from my winter," he said. "I don't do any personal appearances. If you get caught up into that stuff, the next thing you know it's spring training, and I don't want that to happen."

He's definitely against seeing a movie made about the season. "The whole country already saw the movie, so why would they want to do one?" McGwire said. "They saw the whole thing happening. That's the real thing, there's no Hollywood get-up." Since arriving in St. Louis on July 31, 1997, McGwire has had enough attention for an entire career. September was a blur of sellout crowds standing in anticipation and seldom leaving disappointed.

He scaled a Mount Everest of homers, with their distance this year alone totaling an estimated 29,598 feet. He was an equal-opportunity destroyer, hitting them off 65 pitchers. His good-natured duel with Sammy Sosa enthralled fans down the stretch. McGwire ended his season four ahead of Sosa.

All this, despite McGwire's strict, almost religious adherence to the strike zone. During one frustrating stretch, La Russa predicted McGwire would top Babe Ruth's 1923 record of 170 walks by Sept. 1. McGwire ended at 162 walks, one for every game of the season.

McGwire earned every bit of the dollar-a-head bonus the Cardinals gave him for every paying customer past 2.8 million, leading the team to a franchise attendance record of 3,195,021. And when the pressure was on, he got even better. After Sosa tied him at 66, McGwire hit five homers in his final 11 at-bats. "I've amazed myself that I've stayed in such a tunnel for so long throughout what I had to deal with as far as the media, the expectations, almost every eye in the country watching," McGwire said.

Led by McGwire, the Cardinals won 11 of their final 14 games and finished 83-79, 10 wins better than last year but 19 games behind Houston, the NL Central champion.

"What the second half shows is a lot about the 1998 team and a little bit about 1999," La Russa said.

As for that plot — okay, so it's still pretty inept. A wealthy Asian collector's daughter has been kidnapped and the ransom is set for 50 million dollars. Chan plays Lee, a private agent who comes to America to search for the daughter. But the FBI thinks he'll only be in the way, so they assign LAPD squad clown Tucker to keep Chan out of trouble. And of course, the duo end up solving the case on their own.

Most of the humor comes from that popular foreigner– meets–America plot device, where the hero is presented as completely naive to our cultural tendencies. The rest of the film belongs to Tucker and another obnoxious age–old plot device — independent cop–gets–a–stupid–assignment–and–a–rookie–partner.

Rush Hour set an unprecedented record in its opening weekend, grossing $33 million, the most of any fall opening ever — even beating The Fugitive. The key to this is a mix of stunts and action, some outrageous lines, and a few added little touches. Even the kidnapped daughter is hilarious, singing away to Mariah Carrey in the car. And as with every Chan movie, stay for the outtakes. B

Rockies manager fired, may take office job

DENVER (AP) — Don Baylor, the only manager the Colorado Rockies have had since they began play in 1993, was fired today in the start of an offseason shakeup following a disappointing 77-85 year.

"After a long, thorough and very difficult evaluation, we feel a change in chemistry is necessary on the field and in the clubhouse," team owner Jerry McMorris said.

Baylor was offered a front-office job, but he did not immediately decide to accept it.

Both Baylor and Bob Gebhard, the general manager since the Rockies began, have been criticized all year following an eight-game losing streak in early April that dropped the team out of contention.

While Baylor will not return to the dugout, Gebhard will be back in the front office. McMorris said the team would create another vice president's post with broad player personnel responsibilities. After the Rockies came from behind to defeat San Francisco 9-8 on Sunday, Baylor sounded as if he expected to be fired.

"I think it's probably 50-50," he said. "I'll just have to sit back and wait to see what they do. I can live with what I've done here in six years. This was a tough year, but everybody has always played hard for me. They could have packed it in after the first two weeks of the season, but they didn't. They never showed me that the effort wasn't there."

Among those reportedly being considered to replace Baylor are Jim Leyland of the Florida Marlins and Felipe Alou of Montreal. In addition, Art Howe may lose his job with the Oakland Athletics and become a candidate in Colorado.

After their final game of the season, Rockies players supported their manager.

Larry Walker, who won the NL batting title, said, "Don Baylor is a great individual. He's made some mistakes, but everybody sees how managers make mistakes. I enjoy playing for him. I'd play for him any day. I went out there and played hard for him, and there have been other managers that maybe I haven't played as hard for."

now head into the Atlantic 10 portion of its schedule on Friday when they host Temple.

The hope for this squad, however, is that Sunday's win will end up being a turning point in the season.

"I told them that the A–10 starts tomorrow," said Rudy to his team in a meeting on Saturday night. "We can't wait until then [once the A–10 season starts] to find out who is going to step up and who is going to play a part on this team."

It sure looks like everyone stepped up on Sunday.

next five or so weeks.

"I know that we are going to fight hard," he said. "It's expected and it's part of the tradition."

So now it's up to the players to see how they will respond. They know about all of the NCAA appearances and other tidbits.

It's very likely that the alarm clock has gone off thanks to Saturday's speech, and that a sixteenth trip to the promised land is only six weeks away.

Just like the sign says over Rudy's door: "When I walk out onto the field I doubt defeat."

Doubting defeat is all it takes to make No. 16 a reality. As long as the Minutewomen believe that, then it should become one.

UM men's tennis starts season; will face M.I.T. in home opener

By Tim Smith
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's tennis team opened the season over the weekend in the West Point Invitational, showing some promise in several matches and going 10–11 overall.

Today, the Minutemen will begin its home schedule as it hosts M.I.T. at the Upper Boyden tennis courts in a 3 p.m. contest.

Playing well in several matches throughout the tournament was junior Bo Navarro. Navarro, who sat out last year with a back injury, came back to win the Flight C consolation bracket. After losing a close match in his opener, Navarro went on to win three straight matches while only dropping one set.

"Bo is playing the best tennis of anybody on the team," UMass coach Judy Dixon said.

The rest of the men's singles also faired well. Senior Todd Cheney advanced to the quarterfinals of the Flight A bracket before being ousted by the eventual tournament winner.

"He fought hard," Dixon said. "He also was playing some of his best tennis."

The team as a whole won 10 matches while dropping 11. The doubles teams also showed some promise with Navarro and junior Rob Manchester advancing to the quarterfinals.

Today, the tennis team looks to build on its success from the weekend.

"This team is much stronger than last year's team," Dixon said.

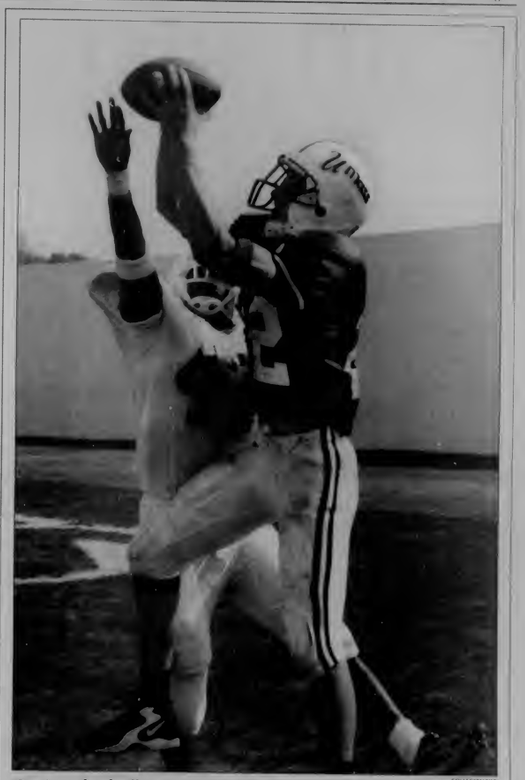
With six freshman residing on the twelve player roster, however, the Minutemen remain a young team and will be able to put to good use forthcoming experience.

"Their best tennis is ahead of them," Dixon said. "Once the doubles teams are solidified, they should fair even better."

The three aspects that Dixon sees as being positives thus far are the team's camaraderie, enthusiasm and tenacity.

"The team doesn't give up," Dixon said.

She attributed this to players like Cheney who seem to fight for each and every point. The weakest link, according to Dixon, is the doubles play.



"We're hoping to play with a little more aggression," Dixon said.

Although the doubles teams are struggling there appears to be some untapped resources in a few players.

"There is a lot of doubles talent," Dixon said. "We just need to find the right combination."

One of the goals for UMass this year is to move up in the rankings of the Atlantic 10. Last year the team finished fifth in the standings and they hope to move up to second or third.

According to Dixon, another team goal is a top 15 finish in the regional standings, a place she feels the team is already within reaching.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You'll find yourself swept up in another's pet cause today. You can do good work and contribute to their progress.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Now is no time to sit back and let opportunities go by. You have choices to make, and one or two may defy rationale.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Spend some time alone today to recharge your spiritual batteries. You've been too willing to get caught up in the "grind."

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Be willing to live up to your duties and obligations today. Shirk, and you'll pay for it for some time to come.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may find it difficult to communicate openly with a loved one or co- worker today. There is more to this dilemma than meets the eye.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You'll win a good deal of respect today, but come nightfall you may do something to risk everything you've gained.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Don't be fooled today: what you don't know can hurt you — and those around you as well. If you don't know what you're doing, don't meddle.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — It's up to you to provide others with certain key needs at this time. Your efforts won't go unrecognized — or unrewarded.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Avoid emotional pitfalls today by pinpointing your vulnerability as early as possible.

Minutewomen dispose of Texas 4–1
"Three Amigas" lead the charge for UMass

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

BOULDER, Colo. — All you needed to see was the first two minutes of Sunday's game between the Massachusetts and Texas women's soccer teams to know that this one was going to produce a fruitful result for the Minutewomen.

Sophomore Kara Green stole a clearing attempt by Longhorns keeper Cami Varnadore and chipped a ball just wide of an empty net in the opening 30 seconds. Then, just over a minute later, Sophie Lecot outraced a Texas defender to a loose ball and put one past Varnadore for a 1–0 UMass lead.

The senior co–captain's first of two goals on the day paved the way to a 4–1 victory over Texas at the Pleasant View Soccer Complex in Boulder, Colo. Green had two goals and two assists with Emma Kurowski tallying two assists of her own in UMass' third victory of the year.

"We played with great focus today and worked hard," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "And tactically they listened to what we asked them to do."

Lecot's goal represented the first time all year the Minutewomen had scored the first goal in a game. Green tacked on to that lead about 18 minutes later, as she took a feed from Katelyn Jones and drove one over Varnadore from about 35 yards out.

Five minutes later it was Lecot who struck again, gathering a pass from Green in the Texas end and tucking a shot home for a 3–0 lead. That would be more than enough for UMass keeper Cori Stevens, who made 10 saves in the contest despite allowing a goal late in the first half.

The first three UMass goals were a result of solid scouting of the Longhorns in their game Friday against Maryland. All of the tallies were a result of exploiting weaknesses that were detected by Rudy in Friday's tilt.

"When we scouted them Friday we noticed that they were playing with a flatback three and we felt that we could get behind them with regularity, which we did," Rudy said. "Then we saw that their keeper was active behind the defense, and I told Sophie and Kara that if they were one– on–one, then they could beat her with the passing shot. And sure enough, there it was."

But it wasn't just the offense that came through on Sunday. The Minutewomen played arguably their best defensive game of the year, keeping close tabs on all of the Longhorns offensive threats.

"Our defenders are growing up. Today was the best that our people have tracked all year," Rudy said. "Sarah [Cook], Tarah [Tokarchik] and all of the midfielders played great defensively."

UMass (3–6) finally put the game away late in the second half. Cindy Garceau booted a free kick into the box, where it was knocked down by Kurowski. The junior forward only got a piece of the ball on her shot, but the deflection ended up right on the foot of Green, who shot one into the bottom left corner for a 4–1 final.

The Minutewomen salvaged a split in Boulder thanks to Sunday's victory. UMass fell to the host Buffaloes on Friday 4–0, and will

Will UMass continue its storied tradition?

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

BOULDER, Colo. — I was in heaven on Sunday afternoon. Well, as close as you can get without passing over to the other side.

I sat in the shade at the Pleasant View Soccer Complex. The weather was perfect, and the backdrop for this picturesque scene was the Rocky Mountains. Most importantly, however, was the fact that the Massachusetts womens soccer team was beating Texas.

Things were much better than they were 36 hours earlier.

Friday night in Boulder was not too pleasant for the Minutewonien. UMass had just fallen to a struggling Colorado squad 4–0. This was a game the Minutewomen should have won, but didn't. Things were nearing the boiling point.

On Saturday night at 5 p.m. MST, the boiling point arrived. UMass coach Jim Rudy had had enough, and he made sure he let his team know it.

"I just said to them that the A–10 schedule starts tomorrow," he said. "We can't wait until then [once the A– 10 portion of the schedule begins] to find out who is going to step up and who is going to play a part on this team."

At this point, two words come to mind: motivation and tradition. The motivation was taken care of by Rudy. His team's response: a 4–1 thumping of Texas that was arguably UMass' best effort of the season.

"They had great focus and worked hard," said Rudy after the victory. "And tactically they listened to what we asked them to do."

Tradition, however, is another story.

The 1998 edition of the Minutewomen is in jeopardy of straying from a storied history, one of the most prominent in collegiate women's soccer.

It's easy to see what the tradition of UMass' women's soccer is all about. Zero losing seasons in the 20 year history of the program. Fifteen NCAA tournament appearances, including six trips to the Final Four.

Not much more needs to be said.

As UMass stands with a 3–6 mark right now, it has already tied the single–season record for most losses by a Minutewomen team — and the season is not even halfway complete.

Lost in all of the early season troubles, however, is one very important thing: the first nine games will be thrown out the window when UMass takes the field versus Temple on Friday afternoon.

In fact, that will be when the real season begins, and everyone else in the A–10 will be gunning for the defending champs.

Now, however, as the Atlantic 10 slate opens Friday, there are still some questions that need to be answered.

Will Sunday's outstanding effort turn out to be nothing more than a phase, or will it turn out to be the turning point of the season?

Will the grueling non–conference schedule that has contributed to the lackluster 3–6 start benefit UMass in the season's second half?

Who will step up and take charge, and even be willing enough to carry the team on her shoulders if need be?

We have a little more than a month to find out these answers.

Rudy, however, is sure of one thing that will transpire over the

Men's X-C takes ninth in trip to the Bronx, NY

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Correspondent

At its first major competition of the fall season, the Massachusetts men's cross country team took home the ninth place spot at the fourth annual Meet of Champions in the Bronx on Saturday. This meet is comprised of eighteen schools from all across the nation.

Iona won the competition with 38 points, and became the first team to win the prestigious race two consecutive years. Dartmouth finished second (50), Harvard in third (96), and Army in fourth (112).

The Minutemen scored 260 points. Leading the way were senior Dan LeBoeuf (35th overall at 26:38.9), junior Kevin Somers (44th overall at 26:42.4), sophomore Brendan Sullivan (59th overall at 27:07.6), freshman Kevin Curtin (68th overall at 27:25.7), and sophomore Thomas Stuart (82nd overall at 27:44.0).

Clearly dominating the meet with the home field advantage, the Iona Gaels held the top score, led by senior Richard Santos (24:54), who now holds both the fourth and fifth fastest times at the Meet of Champions.

"If a 100 yard football field can have a home field advantage, imagine the effect of a five mile course," UMass head coach Ken O'Brien said

It's no surprise to see LeBoeuf and Somers once again in the top spots for the Minutemen. Last week, both men led UMass to victory.

O'Brien expects to see great things from these athletes as the season progresses. He also believes these two will help push the team forward and fill the void left by Ryan Carerra.

Though the team came in ninth, each of their times were higher that those run in last week at the harriers' final home meet last weekend.

Last weekend, the confident minutemen crushed the competition and embarrassed their top competitor, Vermont. This weekend, however, UMass faired much differently.

Clearly the unfamiliarity of the track and nervousness of their first away meet were against them; however, in 1996, UMass placed 11th at the meet, and their current ninth place finish illustrates the energy, drive, determination, and talent of this team.

Expect great things from the squad as they prepare over the next week for their October 2nd competition where they will be put to the test at the IC4A Championships at Van Cortland Park in the Bronx, N.Y.

Hirsch, UMass women's X–C split the pack in a trip to NY

By Laura Sansoucy
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's cross country team finished 10th last weekend in the Meet of Champions at Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx, N.Y. A total of 21 teams competed, including Penn State, Dartmouth and Princeton, making for an impressive UMass performance.

Placing first for the Minutewomen and 33rd overall with a time of 18:56.4 was junior Sally Hirsch.

Hirsch is one of UMass' strongest runners, and is off to a promising start after the third meet of the season. She came into the season as a possibility to step into the number one spot on the team after the graduation of record–setter Rebecca Donaghue.

Hirsch placed in the top ten overall at the Atlantic 10 Championships in 1997 with her ninth place performance. This showing earned her All–Conference honors last year.

Placing second for UMass and 42nd overall with a time of 19:10.7 was junior Sharon Tillotson. Seniors Tracy Meagher and Nicole Way followed seconds behind, placing 46th and 48th, respectively. Meagher finished with a time of 19:13.2, Way with a time of 19:16.0.

Way will also be counted on heavily this season. She placed eighth overall at the Atlantic 10 Championship a year ago, a performance which earned her All–Conference honors as well.

Way also placed third for UMass at the NCAA District I Qualifier, and had a season–best time of 18:52 at the New England Championships last year. It is clear that the team will look for her peak performance at future meets.

Rounding out the UMass runners were sophomore Melissa Henderson, taking 62nd place with a time of 19:28.3, and junior Monica Elmore, finishing 63rd with a time of 19:28.6.

Team performances, as well as individual performances, has been both strong and consistent, so far. At the team's opening meet on September 12 in Philadelphia, the Minutewomen placed first out of five teams.

The following meet against BU and Vermont on September 19 at Totman Field confirmed fans' hopes for an exciting season. UMass put out great effort and placed second.

Coach Julie LaFreniere, an accomplished Massachusetts runner herself, appears to be molding another championship team.

The Minutewomen have almost three weeks off to prepare for a trip to Boston. The team is scheduled to compete at the New England Championships on Friday, October 16, at Franklin Park.

UM water polo defeats three; improves to 9–1

By Alexander Wood
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts water polo team continued to romp through the CWPA League competition, as they swept Boston College, St. Francis, and Brown at last weekend's CWPA tournament in Providence, R.I.

The sweep is a repeat of the September 12 tournament in which the Minutemen brushed aside Fordham, M.I.T., and Harvard.

The Minutemen kicked off the tournament on Saturday winning an 18–2 victory over Boston College with UMass Senior Brian Stahl and junior sensation Timmy Troupis picking up the hat tricks to send the Eagles packing.

UMass then dispatched St. Francis with a 13–7 bombardment. Seniors Aldo Roman and Stahl led the Minutemen with four tallies a piece while Troupis scored a deuce to conclude the action for Saturday.

The Minutemen picked up right where they left off when the team played the next day, downing Brown 12–6. The two schools were locked up at four apiece at the half, but the Minutemen pulled away in the third quarter outscoring the Bears 4–1.

Stahl repeated his performance from the day before against St. Francis, as he knocked four home, with teammate Roman managing to find the net three times. Troupis notched two of his own.

Meanwhile, at the other end of the pool, sophomore goalie Richard Huntley continued his strong play in net with nine saves, giving him a total of 19 saves for the three game tournament.

UMass dominated the tournament, outscoring opponents 43–15. With the victories, the Minutemen's record improved to 9–1 overall and 6–0 in the CWPA. The wins combine to give the Minutemen a six game winning streak, dating back to September 12 and the CWPA League Tournament in Cambridge, Massachusetts. UMass hasn't lost since its one and only loss to Queens back on September 6, a 6–7 defeat. UMass already looks to be a formidable contender for the Eastern Championship, as the Minutemen have outscored their opponents 147–52 and are averaging a game score of 15–5.

Stahl led the Minutemen's domination on offense in the tournament, picking up eleven goals, while Roman and Troupis each notched seven. The UMass offense has been well dispersed with thirteen different Minutemen scoring at least one goal in last weekend's tournament. Meanwhile, netminder Huntley has been solid and consistent, posting a 5.93 GAA with a .602 save percentage on the season.

American fugitive may face extradition

BORDEAUX, France (AP) — American fugitive Ira Einhorn won a new reprieve from jail yesterday, telling a French court considering another U.S. extradition request that he has put his days of disappearing behind him.

"I will remain here. I want to live in France and stay in France," said the former New Age leader convicted in absentia in Pennsylvania for the 1977 murder of his girlfriend.

The prosecution had argued that mounting U.S. pressure might prompt Einhorn to flee the country.

Einhorn, 57, beat an extradition request last December but was re-arrested Sept. 20. Sporting cropped white hair, a long goatee and a suntan, Einhorn was escorted to pick up his belongings from a nearby jail. But his time out of custody may not last long if French courts decide to extradite him. Einhorn is also required to check in weekly with police until a Dec. 1 extradition hearing.

Einhorn's longtime Swedish companion Anika Flodin, who lived with him in a converted mill in the Bordeaux region, gasped as the ruling was read, then ran from the courtroom.

Microsoft competitor to turn in documents

WASHINGTON (AP) — A judge yesterday ordered software-maker Oracle Corp. to turn over some internal documents to rival Microsoft Corp, which believes the papers will help it fight the government's antitrust lawsuit.

But U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson agreed to limit the types of information that Oracle must hand over to Microsoft. Oracle, a $7.1 billion competitor based in Redwood City, Calif., called Microsoft's original request for documents "far too vast."

Oracle said Microsoft "apparently believes that its status as an accused monopolist entitles it to use judicial process to delve into its competitors' most sensitive commercial information." Microsoft, in turn, accused Oracle of trying to hide evidence that will help its court case.

Microsoft described the information it wants as "plainly relevant." It asserts that Oracle is included among companies that formed a "Rebel Alliance," which collaborated to oppose Microsoft's industry influence.

Oracle's refusal to turn over the documents — less than three weeks before the Oct. 15 trial — could have been grounds for further delays in the case, but yesterday Jackson indicated the case will begin as scheduled.

"There will be no further delays," he said.

Pay linked to review

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

As part of their three–year contract, almost half the pay increases given to faculty at the University of Massachusetts will be linked to a post–tenure review.

According to John T. Hoey, director of communications at the UMass president's office, the total pay increases are divided into three sections: the tenure–review process, merit– based, and automatic, which one gets after working for a certain period of time.

The reason the administration wanted to have a post tenure–review process, Pearson said, was in order to "respond to an increasing public call for accountability and to provide an opportunity for faculty development."

"[Post–tenure review] is an issue that is being discussed nationally and while the two groups were at the bargaining table when deciding what to put in the contract, the issue came up and both sides agreed to it," Hoey said.

A group of about 14 faculty members called the Committee on Periodic Multi–Year Review (PMYR) gathered input from the rest of the faculty to find out what the review should contain.

Also as part of the contract, a task force will be made to discuss permitting students access to their evaluations of faculty members. Students will be part of the task force.

Susan Pearson, associate chancellor, said the Massachusetts Society of Professors has to bring a review recommended by the PMYR back to the bargaining table by Feb. 1. If they don't, she said, there will not be a "5 percent pay increase."

A forum held by the MSP in cooperation with the Chancellor and Provost's offices Monday evening informed the faculty about PMYR's recommended review. It was the "kickoff even of our campus–wide post–tenure review," said Jenny Spencer, president of the MSP.

Christine Licata, senior associate of the American Association of Higher Education and Associate dean of Rochester Institute of Technology was the speaker at the meeting. She told the faculty members who attended about the different ways a post–tenure review could be created.

In most cases, post–tenure review is not a "re–tenuring process," Licata said. Of all the schools in the nation who have created a post–tenure review, she said, only two private institutions created an actual re–tenure process.

Licata emphasized that post–tenure review should encourage the development of faculty's careers and not discourage professors that are not performing up to par.

Police contract still in mediation

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

Negotiations of the University of Massachusetts police department's contract remain stagnant following the third unsuccessful mediation session, held last Friday between the department and the University.

According to Officer Brian Narkewicz, the president of the International Brotherhood of Police (IBPO) Local 432A unit (the UMass police department's union), mediation efforts failed to yield an acceptable agreement for the department, largely because the University continues to present the same offer as it did last June.

"The University is not bargaining responsibly," Narkewicz said. "[Representatives of the University] came to the table with no new authority."

The UMass police department's contract expired in December of 1997 and has been under negotiation since January of this year.

In June, the University offered the department a one–year extension of their current contract. Narkewicz said, including a 3 percent salary increase and limited education incentives.

Labor Relations administrator Nick Marshall wouldn't comment on the specifics of the contract offered to the department but said that the University wants to reach an agreement "as soon as possible."

"We're going to cooperate with the mediator and the process and we hope that we get there," Marshall said.

Despite Amherst's designation as the "flagship campus," Narkewicz said, the police departments at both the UMass Boston and Worcester campuses are earning more money under contract than the Amherst police department.

In order to voice concerns about contract inequities, the department plans to hold an informational picket of the Leadership Summit Meeting at the Mullins Center on the eve of the next mediation session, scheduled for Oct. 7. Narkewicz said.

The department plans to ask the host of the meeting, Robert Karam, chairperson of the Board of Trustees of UMass Amherst, for assistance and an explanation of the protracted contract negotiations.

Narkewicz said that he "can't be optimistic" about the next mediation session and expects it to be "another one of many unproductive meetings."

UMass Chief of Police John Luippold commented on the negotiations.

"We're very fortunate to have dedicated and professional police officers on this campus and it would be my hope that they receive the recognition they deserve."

The department has held several informational pickets since they first filed a petition with the Board of Conciliation Arbitration on Aug. 17.

On Sept. 17, officers walked together from the police station in Dickinson Hall to Whitmore Administration Building to ask Chancellor David Scott for his support.

Sergeant Thomas O'Donnell, president of the IBPO Local 432B sergeant's unit, and Narkewicz presented Scott with a letter, thanking him for the time he has spent lobbying on behalf of the department to pass Senate Bill 1310, which would grant them Group 4 Retirement Status, and asking him to extend "the same level of commitment to our current contract negotiations."

Congress OKs higher-education bill

By Robert Greene
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The millions of students who borrow money for college will pay less interest because of a higher-education bill that cleared Congress yesterday.

President Clinton said he will sign the bill, which also raises the ceiling on grants and work–study for needy students. He urged Congress to enact separate legislation needed to pay for the increases as well as other programs authorized in the bill. The bill "demonstrates how we can make progress on education policy when we choose bipartisan cooperation over division," said Clinton.

Besides providing more student aid and streamlining its delivery, the five-year reauthorization of higher education programs takes steps to improve teacher preparation, monitor college costs, report campus crimes, monitor hate crimes and discourage drug or alcohol abuse.

But the student aid provisions are the centerpiece of the legislation.

"In the face of rising college costs, Congress will provide students with the lowest-cost loans in nearly two decades," said Sen. James Jeffords (R-Vt.) and chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, before the 98-0 vote. The House had passed the bill Monday on a voice vote.

The bill creates a new interest-rate formula, based on Treasury bill rates and added points, for student loans. As a result, the rate for students would be 7.46 percent for graduates starting to repay their loans — the lowest rate in 17 years. Rates are capped at 8.24 percent.

Clinton may face same investigation as Nixon

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Republicans are weighing a plan to give the Judiciary Committee virtually the same open-ended authority for investigating President Clinton that the panel had during its impeachment inquiry for Richard Nixon a quarter-century ago, GOP sources said yesterday.

The disclosure came as Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott cautioned that recent sharp Democratic criticism of GOP handling of the impeachment review "undercuts everything" — including the possibility of an eventual plea-bargain that would punish the president but fall short of impeachment.

Among House Republicans, sources who spoke on condition of anonymity said no final decisions have been made about the precise mandate the panel will receive if, as expected, the House votes to establish an impeachment inquiry next week.

But several officials said the approach used in 1974 is being viewed as a model. They added that strong consideration was being given to using the same text that was passed during Watergate, replacing the name "Richard M. Nixon," with "William J. Clinton."

The previous panel received authority to "investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach" the president.

Presenting such a proposal for consideration would enable Republicans to expand their inquiry well beyond Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's evidence concerning Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky. It would open the door, for example, into other areas such as alleged fund-raising violations during the president's 1996 re-election campaign.

At the same time, it would pose a dilemma to Democrats who are arguing the inquiry should be limited to Starr's evidence, yet are insisting the House follow a set of standards that guided the committee in 1974 under the chairmanship of Rep. Peter Rodino (D-N.J.).

Republicans planned their next move as officials prepared for the release of a mountain of new evidence from Starr later this week.

Sources familiar with the documents, speaking on condition of anonymity, said they include grand jury testimony from former Clinton adviser Dick Morris. Morris testified that presidential allies had mounted a "secret police operation to go

Documentary on racism to air

By Julie Fiatkow
Collegian Staff

With a raised fist and a microphone in hand, the photograph of activist Tony Ino Baptiste on the cover of a March 1997 edition of The Valley Advocate embodied the spirit of the Goodell Takeover.

In April of 1997 the same picture was cut out and defaced, for use in a flyer advertising a Skindog's Army concert — a Holyoke band describing itself as "pro–white."

Baptiste, a senior psychology student, was handed the poster by a friend. On it, he saw his own image with a drawn–on curly mustache, devil's horns, a pentagram on his chest and a giant letter "S" in his hand. The flyer had been seen in bus stops in Northampton, as well as all over Springfield.

A documentary written by Baptiste about his experience will be featured in a panel discussion on racism tonight at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. The panel will include guest speakers Dean Robinson, William Cross, Lisa Robinson and Nelson Acosta.

Baptiste said that his response to the flyer first led him to Legal Services.

"They were ready to assist," he said, "but they could not get an address [of the band]."

Baptiste then approached the police for help, but to no avail.

Peace Corps seeking volunteers

By Samantha Poulten
Collegian Correspondent

The Peace Corps has been busy this week looking to recruit volunteers for positions in Africa, Asia, Latin America and Eastern Europe.

The New England Regional Recruitment Office is looking for approximately 40-50 students from the Five College area to participate in the program this year.

Mike Simsik, the Five College Area Peace Corps Recruiter and University of Massachusetts graduate student, is hoping that by beginning the recruitment procedures earlier than normal, more graduating seniors will be able to join.

"I'm hoping that by starting the second week of school, students will be convinced to apply earlier so that they know their overseas destination by February or March. This way they will be ready to leave right after graduation when there are more positions available," Simsik said.

Over 95 percent of the students who volunteer for the Peace Corps are graduating seniors with bachelor's degrees or higher. UMass tends to have high rates of volunteers, ranking in the top 20 in terms of graduates volunteering per year.

Jean Seigle, regional manager of the New England office of the Peace Corps, said there are opportunities for all students, not just those in a specific technical field.

"No matter what your area of study, Peace Corps can use you. Often, students only need their bachelor's. At most they may need to do three months volunteer work. We will help them find the resources that they need to qualify," Seigle said.

The qualification process begins by filling out an application in the Peace Corps office. An interview process follows, where the applicant meets with representatives from the Five College area, as well as representatives from the Boston regional office.

Once chosen, the student receives an assignment in the area they prefer and begin immediately following graduation. Volunteers are especially needed in English teaching.

"We are primarily looking for students to teach English as a second language to middle and high school students," Simsik said. "Anyone with experience in tutoring, or just an interest in teaching, can help."

Other primary areas for volunteer work include agricultural extension, small business development and health extension.

Simsik said the Peace Corps is a good opportunity for anyone, especially those interested in cross cultural settings.

"Serving, and helping others is an experience I would recommend for everyone," Simsik said.

For more information contact Mike Simsik at 545-2105 or visit the Peace Corps office at 112 Stockbridge Hall. There will also be a meeting on Nov. 18 at 7 p.m. in room 905 in the Campus Center for all those interested.

they said they had the 'right to protect citizens of the country,' and that they could not give out an address."

Baptiste said although they put a detective on the case, he never received any more information about the incident from them.

"From that point," said Baptiste, "I was really struggling with a lot of anger and hurt. I was searching for support to deal with it."

It was then the Dr. Katja Hahn-D'errico, director of campus student businesses, suggested to Baptiste that he take a diversity education class.

"I took a social diversity class, Education 210, and a video documentary class, Education 396, which was part of the 210 class," Baptiste said.

"As part of the project we worked as a team to complete a documentary on any of the 'isms.'"

His group, which also included producer Sasha Aaronson and camera-person Elizabeth Mattison, decided to do a documentary on racism and created "Distorted Image," Baptiste's account of what happened in the Spring of 1997.

"One of the significant things that happened," said Baptiste, "is that it gave me a chance to express all my hurt.

"I had the opportunity to meet with Dr. Bill Cross, the psychologist who established the stages of racial identity.

Through interactions with him, I was able to understand how I could better help myself through these issues."

For "Distorted Image," Baptiste won a $500 scholarship from the Institute for Public Media Arts. Along with Baptiste, 140 other students were awarded the Don Eldon "Ism" Scholarship.

$250 of the prize goes toward film editing and the rest of the team that helped produce the documentary.

Over the summer, Jamie Philip Arroyo, president of the newly formed chapter of fraternity La Unidad Latina, Lambda Upsilon Lambda, talked to Baptiste about including his documentary in a racism discussion.

"I'm at a point that I feel I've grown a lot from this experience," Baptiste said.

"It was always my dream to take this experience and make it into an educational experience. Now this dream has been actualized."

Tonight's panel discussion will look at racism from four different angles: how is racism perpetuated; what are the psychological impacts on the target group; what are the stages of racial identity development; and what role education plays in helping to reduce acts of racism in general.

The free discussion is presented by the members of La Unidad Latina, Lambda Upsilon Lambda Fraternity, Inc.

Proposed prison site incites controversy

By Nancy Zuckerbrod
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Some residents of the poorest section of the nation's capital say they already have a sewage treatment plant and a mental institution in their neighborhood, and they don't want a prison built there, too.

"It will destroy our community. It's already a broken community with few economic resources," said Ken McClenton, a local activist.

But the proposal to build a new multi-million-dollar private correctional facility also has some strong support, including outgoing Mayor Marion Barry, who lives in the area.

Barry views it "as a way to bring jobs and money to the district," said spokesman Barrington Salmon.

Opponents said a prison in the city's most economically-depressed quadrant would be another scar on a community that already houses St. Elizabeth's, the city's mental hospital, and a sewage treatment facility but lacks supermarkets and other businesses. Safeway recently announced it was closing a supermarket in the neighborhood.

The new prison would accommodate 2,200 low- and medium-security inmates now housed 15 miles outside the District at Lorton Correctional Complex in Virginia's Fairfax County. That overcrowded prison is scheduled to close by 2001.

District zoning officials are considering whether to rezone the 42-acre site near the Potomac River for a prison run by Nashville, Tenn.-based Corrections Corporation of America.

The National Park Service owns the property, but last year Congress authorized a land swap for 84 acres owned by CCA in Prince George's County, Md.

CCA has come under fire in recent months for its management of a prison in Youngstown, Ohio, that houses some D.C. inmates. Six inmates escaped from the Ohio facility in July. They were eventually recaptured.

"I'm concerned for P.G. County, living so close to a prison community," said activist Joyce Beck, a county resident. "I'm also concerned for Southeast Washington, D.C. Perhaps if there were no children growing up there, then I wouldn't be so concerned."

"Escapes are something we can never say is never going to happen," said Joe Johnson, a member of CCA's board of directors. However, the inmate population planned for the facility would have shorter sentences and would be less prone to escapes, he added.

Information about the University Alcohol Policy:
Important changes in sanctioning • WHAT EVERY STUDENT SHOULD KNOW

Why Changes in Alcohol Sanctions?

• The University has a responsibility to implement policies to protect the rights of members of our community from the negative actions of those who abuse alcohol.
• Recently there have been some severe and unfortunate incidents involving the misuse of alcohol in our community. The misuse of alcohol is of grave concern to all of us.
• Irresponsible and abusive behavior can hinder a student's academic performance, endanger their personal health, and negatively impact on the campus environment.

What do the sanctions really mean?

Housing Probation: A specified period of time during which any further alcohol violations (or other Code of Student Conduct violations) may result in Housing Removal or Housing Relocation.

Housing Relocation & Restriction: You will be assigned to a different residence hall, cluster, or area and you will be prohibited from entering the residence hall, cluster, or area in which you previously lived.

Housing Removal & Restriction: You will not be allowed to live on campus for a specified period of time. You will be prohibited from entering the residence hall(s) from which you are restricted.

Permanent Housing Removal & Restriction: You will not be allowed to live on campus ever again. You may not enter any residence halls ever again.

University Probation: A specified period of time during which any further alcohol violations (or other Code of Student Conduct violations) may result in Suspension from the University.

Suspension: A specified period of time during which you cannot participate in any University sponsored activities. You will be barred from all University premises. You will lose academic credit for a suspension that takes effect during a semester. A suspension may be recorded on your transcript.

*Any monetary losses as a result of Housing Removal will be your own responsibility.

What are the possible consequences for violating the campus alcohol policies? Alcohol Sanctions – Effective September 1998

What are the University alcohol policies?

II.D.10.a Alcohol-Underage Drinking/Possession: In accordance with Massachusetts law, you must be 21 or older to drink or possess alcoholic beverages. If all residents of a room are under 21 years of age, no alcoholic beverages are allowed in the room at any time.

II.D.10.b Alcohol –Open Container in Public Space: The consumption of alcohol or possession of an open or shatterable container of alcohol is prohibited in all common areas of residence halls including, but not limited to, public corridors, stairwells, bathrooms, kitchen units, and lounges. Note: Residents over the age of 21 may consume alcohol in their rooms, whether the door is open or closed.

II.D.10.c Alcohol –Large Volume: The amount of alcohol that an individual student may possess is limited to a 24-pack case of beer or 64 ounces of wine or other alcohol. Kegs, beer balls, and other large volume containers that contain alcoholic beverages are not permitted.

II.D.10.d Alcohol-Providing Alcohol to an Underage Drinker: Residents who are of legal drinking age may not provide alcohol to students under the legal drinking age.

CODE VIOLATIONS	FIRST OFFENSE	SECOND OFFENSE	THIRD OFFENSE
II.D.10.a Under age 21 possession and/or consumption II.D.10.b Open container of alcohol in public space	Housing probation for one year AND Alcohol Education	Relocation and restriction from current residence hall AND Substance abuse referral to REAP	Housing removal and restriction from from current residence hall for one year Suspension from the University for one year
II.D.10.c Possession of keg or large volume of alcohol II.D.10.d Dispensing alcohol to minors	Housing removal and restriction for one year and substance abuse refer ral to REAP OR Relocation and restriction from current residence hall AND Substance abuse referral to REAP	Permanent housing removal and restriction from all residence halls AND University probation	Suspension from the University for one year

Note: All sanctions are cumulative. Consequently, students who already have a judicial history may receive more severe sanctions. Sanctions may also be enhanced based on the severity of the behavior and the impact on the community.

Alcohol Education Workshop
The goal of the Alcohol Education Workshop is to assist those students who are first time offenders of the UMass alcohol policy. The workshop provides the opportunity for students to examine University Alcohol policy and Massachusetts Law, as well as to re-evaluate their personal choices with regards to alcohol use. It is an interactive, two-hour session that explores the common alcohol myths, physiological effects of alcohol use, impact of alcohol abuse on community life, and strategies for change. Additionally, it provides information about other campus resources. Sessions are conducted by alcohol educators and will be held from 7-9 PM on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday during the academic year.

Residential Education Alcohol Program
The Residential Education Alcohol Program (REAP) is a University of Massachusetts Student Assistance Program for addiction prevention that offers substance abuse counseling to all UMass students. Started in 1987 by UMass Housing Services, REAP uses a time-limited counseling and intervention process that helps students change problem substance abuse behaviors. Services include individual assessment and counseling, group counseling, crisis intervention and resource/referral information. The staff can conduct a confidential drug/alcohol use assessment, concluding with a recommendation, if necessary, for follow-up treatment/counseling.

Short-term individual therapy is also available for students within the program. REAP is the only UMass program that offers court-mandated counseling. Students who are court-referred are responsible for completing their mandated counseling within their stated probationary periods. Students may also be referred to REAP as a result of a judicial sanction. The Judicial Workshop consists of 2 individual counseling sessions and 3 three-hour group sessions. Students are also required to complete written self-evaluation assignments between sessions. REAP is located in Moore Lobby in Southwest. For further information, call 545-0137.

Lenders would get a subsidy to hold down the costs. They had earlier threatened to pull out of the loan program because of a previously scheduled change in the loan formula that has since been repealed.

Under the bill, a student who borrowed $12,000 for four years of college would save $650 over the typical 10-year repayment period, based on projections of T-bill rates.

Students who refinance their loans could get lower interest rates if they applied before Jan. 31, 1999.

The measure also raises the maximum authorized amount for Pell Grants from the present $3,000 to $4,500 a year in 1999-2000, and in steps to $5,800 in 2003-2004. But Congress would have to provide the money.

A yet-to-be passed House spending bill for education raises the grant amount to $3,150 in the budget year starting Oct. 1. Past spending bills have raised the amount from $2,470 in 1996 to $3,000 this year.

The bill calls for the Education Department's student loan operations to be converted to a businesslike enterprise with a chief operating officer exempt from civil-service protections. The Department of Education would also gather and publish information on college costs.

around and intimidate women" who had had some kind of relationship with the president, these sources said.

Morris confirmed the account of his testimony in a telephone interview during the day.

The idea of an expanded investigation has hovered over the committee since Starr submitted a report that dealt only with his Lewinsky inquiry. Several committee members are eager to know whether Starr's far-flung investigation into Whitewater, a controversy over FBI files and other issues might include additional evidence of impeachable offenses.

In an unusual bipartisan move that could point the way toward middle ground, two Republicans and two Democrats on the committee sent a letter to the panel's top leaders during the day asking them to contact Starr "in whatever manner you deem appropriate to ascertain his intentions" about subjects currently under active investigation. The letter was signed by Republicans Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Asa Hutchinson of Arkansas, as well as Democrats Howard Berman of California and William Delahunt of Massachusetts.

Lott made his comments at a news conference, where he was asked about recent attacks from the president and his allies on GOP handling of the impeachment review to date.

"It undercuts everything. Everything," Lott said.

"It undercuts the ability to move legislation. It undercuts the ability to deal together in foreign policy. It undercuts the ability to get nominations confirmed. It undercuts the relationship. It is the wrong way to go."

Lott also said he believes that "bad conduct" that brings the presidency into disrepute would be sufficient grounds for impeachment. But he refused to say whether he thought Clinton's affair with Ms. Lewinsky met that standard.

At the White House, spokesman Mike McCurry chided Lott for speaking out on an issue he may have to judge if the House votes to impeach Clinton and the Senate holds a trial. "Why one who would sit in judgment would render preemptively thoughts on what rises to impeachable offense is a bit mystifying," he said.

McCurry also said the White House is pressing Democrats to vote against establishment of a formal inquiry. "The working assumption is that we will make a very vigorous case that there has not been an impeachable offense and members will vote their conscience," he said.

Budget surplus expected

By Alan Fram
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Republicans and Democrats are jousting over credit for the government's first budget surplus in three decades as fiscal 1998 comes to an end.

On this final day of the fiscal year, President Clinton plans to announce that the White House expects the 1998 surplus to approach $70 billion, said knowledgeable federal officials, speaking on condition of anonymity. The figure will be only an estimate, since data on 1998 revenue collections and federal spending won't be final until around Oct. 19.

This will be the government's first black ink since a $3 billion surplus in 1969, and will provide a political boost to incumbents of both parties just weeks before the Nov. 3 congressional elections.

Clinton is likely to use his announcement to claim credit for the accomplishment — and to chide congressional Republicans for proposing to use some of the surplus for an election-year tax cut.

"I think he will want to take the occasion of the first federal budget surplus in a generation to talk about fiscal discipline, what it's meant to the economy and where we go from here," White House spokesman Mike McCurry said yesterday.

"Democratic budget policies are paying off," said Rep. John Spratt of South Carolina, citing Democratic support for deficit-cutting packages in 1990 and 1993.

Republicans are also sure to say their budget-cutting policies since taking control of Congress in 1995 are responsible for the turnaround in the nation's fiscal health.

In an interview yesterday, House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) used that very theme, citing the GOP drive to overhaul welfare and Medicare, trim domestic spending, and cut taxes — which he said "all came together" to spur economic growth and eliminate deficits.

Cost of Georges tallied

By Carolyn Skorneck
Associated Press

LUQUILLO, Puerto Rico — Hillary Rodham Clinton flew by helicopter yesterday through the ravines and over the mountains of Puerto Rico to survey the damage wrought by Hurricane Georges. "I saw the destroyed houses. I saw the effects of the mudslides and the rivers" overflowing the bounds, Clinton said. "I saw how damaging the hurricane was because it went across the entire island."

The first lady, accompanied by a congressional delegation and administration officials, flew to Puerto Rico on the first leg of a trip taking her to Chile and Uruguay.

Georges killed four people in Puerto Rico and caused $2 billion in damage. Water and power were cut off for days for most of the 3.8 million residents. More than 17,000 people left homeless by the storm were being housed in 232 shelters.

In the town of Luquillo on the northeastern coast, Clinton visited a school turned into a temporary shelter and announced steps the federal government was taking to help Puerto Rico, a U.S. commonwealth.

Beginning yesterday, for instance, the government will be shipping 200,000 to 300,000 gallons of water to the island daily. Clinton also announced Puerto Rico will be reimbursed 75 percent of the cost of rebuilding the island's infrastructure, including roads, water filtration systems and municipal facilities.

And the Labor Department will be offering up to $30 million for temporary jobs in rebuilding the island.

Before Clinton arrived, the Secret Service evacuated the shelter for a security check, causing some complaints among the 200 people housed there. But she received several standing ovations during her appearance.

Gov. Pedro Rosello thanked Clinton for the administration's quick response. "We have not had from any president more help than from President Clinton," he said.

President Clinton has already declared Puerto Rico a disaster area, making it eligible for hundreds of millions of dollars in federal disaster aid.

Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo, who announced up to $39 million in emergency grants last week to repair damage to public housing in Puerto Rico, was among the administration officials on this trip. They and the congressional delegation were later going to the Dominican Republic and Haiti, two other Caribbean nations badly damaged by Georges.

The delegation of a dozen members of Congress was led by Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), whose district includes the nation's largest Puerto Rican constituency and the largest Dominican constituency, according to his spokesman.

Northeast is a hoax!

I don't believe in Northeast. I just don't buy it. If you think about it, the theory about the place is full of holes. Here, let me walk you through it.

Last semester a friend of mine approached me and said, "Rob, nobody lives in Northeast." It was only his first semester here, so I was impressed that he had caught on so quickly.

The fiction of Northeast is just another one of the lies UMass tells its students. It's similar to how it covers up the ridiculous ratio of men to women on this campus. There are actually only 77 women on campus. It looks like a lot more because they change their clothes a lot during the course of the day. One day I went through the entire student directory counting women's first names. Sure enough, I counted only 77.

You could argue that since my friend had only been here one semester he just hadn't had enough time to meet someone from Northeast. But I've been here for four years and I've never met any residents of Northeast. I know a lot of people. It takes me 15 minutes to get from one end of the Campus Center to the other. Not one of the people who stops me along the way is ever from Northeast.

I have known residential assistants who claim to be from Northeast. I suppose the place does have to have a staff of people to turn on random lights at night to create the illusion of a population. They try to tell me that people live there, of course. Since they are conspirators in this elaborate hoax, I believe that every word out of their mouths is a filthy lie.

I was in Northeast once. A guy I knew was misplaced by housing into Lewis. I guess when all else fails they will put someone there for a little while. I went to visit him in Northeast before he rectified the situation.

"Without Northeast, the entire school would tip under the psychic weight of Southwest and go spilling into Hadley."

Rob Sullivan

While there I saw neither his supposed roommate nor anyone else who lived in his hall. He moved to Orchard Hill soon thereafter because, as I've said, nobody lives in Northeast.

Everybody has to stay in Northeast for a short time during orientation. Orientation is designed to serve two purposes. One is to make people not want to come to UMass. Orientation is the most miserable and unhappy experience the people, responsible for Whitmore and scrod at the dining commons, could devise.

The second purpose is making people not want to live in Northeast if they have already failed in the first purpose. I can't imagine anyone who went through orientation could possibly want to live in Northeast. There are flaws in the very concept of Northeast. The geography is all wrong. Every living area is separated from campus in some way. Southwest has four lanes of Mass Ave. Orchard Hill and Sylvan have sheer elevation. Central has the Franklin Dining Hall. North Pleasant Street doesn't cut it as a dividing line. Would you want the first thing you see when you wake up every morning to be Lederle?

Then there's the dining hall. Eating at Worcester every day is no way to live. Sylvan people have to eat there, but they're a hardy breed anyway. Worcester supposedly also serves all the residents of Northeast. I'll admit Basics and Pastabilities are nice, but the main part of Worcester is a dank, dark hole. Four words I don't need associated with my dining experience are "barracks," "stifling," "Stone," and "Wildly's."

Why does the University want Northeast to be empty? The answer lies in the compass points. Northeast is the polar opposite of Southwest in every way. Southwest is noisy. Northeast is quiet. Southwest is ugly. Northeast looks kind of nice. Southwest has lots of people. Northeast has no people. The University needs Northeast to be a spiritual counterweight to Southwest. Without Northeast, the entire school would tip under the psychic weight of Southwest and go spilling into Hadley.

The University can't have students living in Northeast for fear of upsetting the delicate equilibrium. One loud party and Van Meter could go flying into the Hampshire Mall. And since they don't want to admit yet another design flaw to go along with the sinking library and the Fine Arts Center (which doesn't look like a piano), they try to convince us that people actually do live there.

I'm sure there will be a few people out there who will claim they know people from Northeast. All I can say to them is that they've been cruelly duped by people they thought were their friends.

For the people who will confront me and claim they live in Northeast I say, "Save your breath. I've heard it all before." Plus, you should keep in mind that I also don't believe in the Internet, Sammy Sosa or atoms. Think about that before you decide I'm worth arguing with.

Rob Sullivan is a UMass student.

Too young to die

As many of us know, the rights of teen-agers are being threatened at every turn. Cities and towns across America have instituted curfews for minors, and the U.S. Supreme Court recently ruled that public schools have the constitutional right to perform random drug tests on student athletes. Any day now Congress is expected to vote on a bill that would ban minors from seeking contraceptives at public clinics without parental consent. Also up for consideration is a bill that would prohibit underage women from crossing state lines for the purpose of seeking an abortion.

"Yet many third world countries look down on our human rights record, as we are one of only four countries worldwide that executes minors."

Jake Lilien

The politicians and magistrates who design these policies insist that minors are too irresponsible and feeble-minded to be left to their own accord. Yet these same people tell us that underage citizens (who they deem too childish to cross the street after 10 p.m.) are of sufficient maturity to be strapped into an electric chair.

Apparently our leaders think that the youth of America are ready for the responsibility of adulthood but not the rights that go along with it. This sort of hypocrisy comes as a surprise to no one. We are taught from an early age not to trust our government, and our cynicism only grows when minors can stand in front of a firing squad but are too young to have a final cigarette. However, the issue of capital punishment (especially for minors) is far too important to dismiss.

The age of the criminal aside, I've never been convinced that in a "humane" society the death penalty is ever appropriate. This isn't a popular belief — polls show that about two-thirds of Americans support capital punishment. But as history has shown us, public opinion and reality are two entirely different things. There are generally five arguments that people use to defend the death penalty: 1) "The only just punishment for a murderer is death;" 2) "Feeding and housing criminals is a waste of our tax dollars;" 3) "Executions make people think twice about committing murder;" 4) "Knowing the killers are dead brings relief to the victims of families; 5) "The death penalty sets a standard in our society." (Apparently that standard is "Don't be violent or we'll kill you.")

The people who make these arguments are unaware that most of them have been proven untrue. It has been widely established that, due to court costs, the death penalty costs more than life imprisonment. It's been equally established that the death penalty does not have any effect on the crime rate (except, in many cases, to possibly raise it). And on the whole, families do not get any lasting satisfaction out of a killer's death.

"So," people ask me, "what would you do if someone killed your mother? You would want them to die, wouldn't you?" This argument (number 1) is one that I myself once believed in. Truth be told, I probably would want to see my mother's killer be given the ultimate punishment. I'd probably want to spend the rest of my life ensuring their constant torture. But that wouldn't make it right. This is a system of justice, not vengeance, and our thirst for revenge shouldn't overtake our desire for basic civility. Plus, (this should be common knowledge after the O.J. trial) our court system is less than perfect. This century alone, we've killed more than 20 prisoners that were later found to be innocent. What could capital punishment possibly accomplish that justifies even one innocent death?

Sentencing a minor to this misguided form of punishment is abhorrent for a society such as ours, where our legislators pride themselves on their beliefs in "family values" and "less government." We Americans, with out jaundiced world- view, see the U.S. as being infinitely more civilized than developing nations. Yet many third world countries look down on our human rights record, as we are one of only four countries worldwide that executes minors. All of western Europe, as well as the United Nations, has rejected the death penalty, yet Americans stubbornly refuse to see past the feel-good solution of eye-for-an-eye barbarism. I recall reading letters in national magazines after a twelve- year-old boy killed his neighbor that insisted he be put to death. If twelve is young enough to die, why not six?

I'm sure that a lot of people who read this will label me as a "bleeding heart." But my opposition to the death penalty doesn't arise from compassion for convicts. Instead, it comes from a desire to see that our society maintains a healthy respect for rationality, rather than emotion. Politicians like Orrin Hatch twho once said, "I believe that life is precious, and I think the death penalty affirms that.") consistently win votes with their "tough on crime" rhetoric. But their underlying message — that killing is a good way to show that murder is wrong — goes far beyond the criminal justice system. It exposes the lack of logical thinking that lies at the heart of most public (and governmental) affairs.

With honors

With so much crap being thrown around about the new Honors College — excuse me, the Commonwealth College — I thought that since I take an active part in the development of this prestigious college as a peer mentor, I should put my two cents in.

First of all, for those of you who think that the Commonwealth College is a new brain child of the administration that will oppress the masses and exclude the common man or woman from our classes: You are wrong. The Honors Program is technically already a college and has been excluding you and oppressing you for years.

" In the end, all of us here are looking for the same thing: the best bang for our buck."

Mark Griffin

The Honors Program handles all of the paperwork for students within the program, and thus serves as our academic dean. Just like the School of Management or the Computer Science Department, there are certain requirements that need to be fulfilled to enter the program, and just like any other department, there are certain classes that need to be taken and passed in order to graduate. Many of those classes are exclusive to people in the Honors Program, much like the classes in any other department that you see in the Pre-registration Guide which say "majors only" next to them. So those of you that are wailing and moaning about being excluded from these classes should also take your complaints to every other department on campus.

The Commonwealth College is being instituted in order to add prestige to our school because as a University, we are trying to establish a better reputation for ourselves. When my friends talk about how they are going to Brown University or Boston College or Holy Cross, I do not want to feel shame when I tell them that I am going to UMass.

The Commonwealth College is attempting to raise the educational standards of our school even further. Sure, the general requirements for attending this school have already been raised, but what does that really mean? That means that in order to gain acceptance into UMass, you have to have good grades and having good grades entails some ball- busting in high school, and that means that you have to be mature enough to do your work, even if you do not care about it.

You do not have to be a genius to go to Harvard, you just have to be a good tester and care enough about doing your work to impress admissions. However, there are people who party as much as they study, if not more, and there are plenty of people who study a lot and don't have the best grades in the class. However, I'd venture to guess that there are as many stupid people at Harvard as there are here.

Yes, there are stupid people here. You know that guy down the hall who just doesn't seem quite smart enough to button his fly every morning? He's dumb as doornails. You know that and he knows that, but he might be receiving better grades that you are. Ultimately, however, the people who do not have the sense to fulfill their responsibility and do their work here are the ones who lose. They are just a waste of space. Don't get me wrong, the world needs ditch diggers, too, but I just don't think that they belong here or anywhere else for that matter.

There are plenty of very smart people here, too, people who really care about their education, and many of whom choose not to partake in the educational bliss that is the Commonwealth College. That is fine, too.

In the end, all of us here are looking for the same thing: the best bang for our buck. We want to have the experience here that our parents told us we would have. We want to get trashed at a frat party and fishbowl in our cars on the way down Route 9 on a Sunday morning. But we also want to be proud of the place that is our home for at least four years of our lives, although some people spend a significantly longer or significantly shorter amount of time here.

If Billy Bulger were here in my room right now, he would agree with me. He would tell me that the University of Massachusetts as a public institution, does not have the funding to maintain the best facilities in the country for its students. We need to make up for that lack of funding with private donations, specifically donations from alumni. To achieve that goal, we need alumni that are successful enough to donate large sums of cash.

Right now the best thing that we can do is start with a small nucleus of people who are highly motivated in their academic work. Honors students are not the privileged few, and we are not necessarily the smartest people here. We are just a bunch of people who want to be successful enough to give back to the place that gave us our education.

Roadblock!

Okay, so at my last estimate there were approximately 13 million students on this campus, each of whom needs to travel across campus approximately 75 times a day. Now, you can do the math if you want to, but I'm just going to say that there is a whole lot of travelling going on around this campus.

I have, in the past, usually enjoyed my strolls between buildings, oftentimes reading the paper, paying zero attention to my surroundings. Occasionally I have to do the "Which way are you going to pass?" dance with a confused stranger. We face each other, sway from side to side for a moment, smile, and proceed.

These pleasant strolls are no longer, I regret to say. The big cheeses here at UMass have put forth a plan to rid me of my daily, mindless stroll and have apparently decided that I need a bit more of a challenge in my daily routine. They seem to have turned my path into a gauntlet of various obstacle challenges, a veritable sporting event.

Mazes of orange, plastic fencing are cropping up all around campus, forcing students to re-route their travels, often sending them off into the nether worlds of campus simply to get around a building. Large, wooden planters seem to have sprouted in the very centers of the walkways, over which each of the estimated 13 million students must pass. The Student Union has been surrounded by large men wielding jackhammers and cement mixers, posting reams of yellow tape that state ominously "CAUTION-CAUTION- CAUTION."

The Old Chapel remains sheathed in scaffolding for what must be the fourth or fifth year, and signs posted state the dangers of getting too close without a hard hat. The Fine Arts Center is a hideous display of construction that appears to be frozen in time, for I neither see construction workers entering or exiting.

We are no longer free to enjoy our campus. Construction has begun. Although the questions still remain to be answered as to why this construction is really necessary, why they have chosen to do it all at once, and most obviously, why they didn't do some of it over the summer. Deciding to block off a large portion of the Student Union area is an absolutely ludicrous thing to attempt in the middle of the fall semester.

"Elsa Allen is a Collegian columnist.

No longer can I enjoy a serene walk from one end of campus to the other. I now have to watch for falling debris from buildings other than the library. I have to keep my head up and my gaze focused in front of me or I run the risk of tumbling head first into a planter the size of a small house.

Perhaps this is simply part of a higher plan by the administration to prepare us for the harsh realities of the outside world by confronting us with a myriad of dangers on our very own campus. Perhaps they realized that forcing us to eat two years worth of dining commons food was not torture enough, and we needed to be subjected to harsher, more rigorous preparations for the "real world."

Perhaps I am mistaken by the notion that it is construction at all. The orange plastic fencing may be on display as some odd form of urban art and is actually there for our enjoyment or as a B.I.A. thesis project for a graduating student.

However, these new additions or alterations (if you will.) to our campus are neither aesthetically pleasing nor are they conducive to efficient travel time to class. Forgive me if I was under the impression that this campus was supposed to be student-friendly.

Well, I am done trying to figure this one out. I think I'll go and sit by the pond for a while and watch the new swans swim gracefully through the crystal clear waters, while listening to the symphonic hums of jackhammers and the screams of ignorant students falling into planters.

Sorry...

Being in love means never having to say you're sorry. Bull feces! (We have a PG audience). When you're in love, you always have to say you're sorry.

You have to be sorry that you're late (even if it's by two minutes), you have to be sorry that you only bought three roses (even if you searched for hours in harsh jungle conditions to find that rare species), and you have to be sorry that you're not in the mood. (Unless you're a woman, in which case, apparently, it's okay. Guys, however, aren't allowed to have a choice — attached guys know what I'm talking about.)

Even worse is the amount of times you have to say you're sorry when not in love. I sat down on the bus last week and brushed against a gentleman sitting next to me. "Sorry," I said.

"So, why did I apologize? Did I do any damage to this guy's jacket? Did I wreck his fragile claustrophobic psyche?"

Seth Koenig

Do I love this man? No, so that takes away the first rule. So, why did I apologize? Did I do any damage to this guy's jacket? Did I wreck his fragile claustrophobic psyche? I'm guessing not. In fact, I'd be willing to bet that this man didn't even realize I had brushed him until I said so.

It happens to me all the time. Some Joe will pass by on a crowded street and make absolutely minimal contact with my sleeve or shoulder. He'll say, "Sorry" in passing. Why?

In my shoes, how do you respond to that?

"Yeah, well you better not do it again!"

Or the kind approach, "I appreciate your concern, good friend, but I think I'll make it. Time heals all wounds."

The word "sorry" has just become too overused. Hell, it's become a greeting of sorts. Two people walking in opposite directions almost walk into each other but sidestep one another with a good couple feet to spare, and they nod, grin, and say, "Sorry." They didn't even touch! Either "sorry" means "hello" there, or these two people have strange force fields that have just been breached by that passing.

"Sorry" is such a popular word they made a board game out of it. Table-top football is one thing, but "Sorry"?

Let's play "Sorry"! We'll see how many times we can move the game pieces into the same space as another piece, at which point in time, we'll say, "Sorry". The one who says "Sorry" the most, wins!

Pardon me, but isn't that called public transportation? Why don't the game pieces share the space and live in mutual, silent happiness?

Even the president has to say he's sorry, which is kind of sad. When the most powerful man in the free world is spending the majority of three months apologizing instead of running the country, it's a good sign that "sorry" is used way too much.

"Ladies and gentlemen, citizens of the United States of America, I would like to say, "I'm sorry."

Good. Move on. If that makes you feel better, Bill, than so be it, but I'm not Hillary and thus I don't care if you screwed around with your intern. Run the damn country.

I would have been just as satisfied with, "Ladies and gents, you've got me. I did it with a cigar, and I did it with a pizza, and I did it with things that only the Prez can get his hands on, but I did it outside the parameters of my job, so get over it. You're not paying me to be celibate, you're paying me to fix what Reagan took eight years to break: the economy.

When Richard Gere cheated on Cindy Crawford, nobody tossed him from acting (although someone should have, because he's an awful actor). I never heard him say he's sorry to the public.

Either way, public or private, the word is everywhere.

The Nerf Herders wrote a song about it called "Sorry." They found the meaning of life, I think: "Sorry we broke up/ Sorry I miss you/ Sorry I wanted only to kiss you..." Sorry, sorry, sorry, sorry.

The versatility of "sorry" is rather disheartening as well, because you not only have to say it when you do something bad, you have to say it when you didn't do something good.

An apology is necessary for doing a terrible job on an assignment as well as for not doing the assignment at all.

"I'm sorry I didn't hold that door quite long enough for you to pass through it."

Imagine if you apologized for everything good that you didn't do.

"I'm sorry I didn't discover America. The Vikings were just quicker."

"I'm sorry I wasn't MVP at the last World Series. I haven't played organized baseball since seventh grade. Yeah, yeah, I know, I missed the Pulitzer Prize, too. My bad."

Perhaps most disappointing of all, though, is that although "sorry" seems to be everywhere in the world, you never get it when you actually deserve it. When being brushed by on the street? Yes. When the University loses your paperwork? Not a chance.

How about when a car almost hits you on a crosswalk? Instead of a "sorry," you get an irritated honk. If that was a person on foot that almost hit you, you'd get an apology, even though a car would have done a lot more damage.

Oh, sorry my article was so long.

Just Cruisin'

Did you know we bombed Iraq?" my best friend asked sometime last semester.

Quite frankly, no, I had no idea. In fact since the middle of my freshman year, I had been in a sensory deprivation tank when it came to current events.

How had I come to this valley of ignorance? After all, I had spent my early years on a plain of enlightenment. I have distinct memories of watching the news at the tender age of six, but after a while, my bath time became 7 p.m. to keep me from imbibing any more disturbing news, courtesy of Tom Brokaw. I had become quite terrified that the Nicaraguan "guerrillas" were really large primacy wielding guns.

In junior high, watching the news was part of the social studies curriculum. Most of us would probably have watched the news in January of seventh grade anyway because we were at war with Iraq. Current events seemed important then because history was in the making; we were about to go to war for a month. Diligently, I recorded the daily news developments in my diary, ready to be the next Anne Frank should the Iraqis invade Massachusetts and force me to go into hiding behind a bookcase.

Undeterred by my ultimate failure in this goal, I continued to watch the news in high school because it fit into that homework procrastination time slot after dinner. When I came to college, awareness of current events was part of my life, and I decided to have The Boston Globe delivered to my dorm room five days a week. Midway through the semester I was doing more recycling than reading.

I realized then that I had landed on Cruise Ship College. It sails the Seas of Good Livin' somewhere between the Land of Reality and the Archipelago of Childhood. After I settled in here at the University of Massachusetts, more often than not I found myself waving at the Land of Reality from across the Channel of Graduation, but I was reluctant to visit there by reading a newspaper or watching the network news, both of which reminded me of the two things that I wanted to forget: world problems and growing old.

At this point in my life I have a complete horror of adulthood. My fears stem from my relatives and what they always told me about growing older: people slow down mentally and physically as they age. I hate to slow down for any reason. This is why I drive through campus with bloody pedestrian carcasses stuck to my front bumper, and just as I am unwilling to slow my car once I'm rolling, I am unwilling to see my memory or metabolism slow down.

Watching the nightly network news reminds me of being old. Take a look at the commercials, and you'll realize who they target audience is. Most commercials are for heartburn medicines, Centrum Silver and laxatives. A few are geared towards the thirty- and fortysomethings who have kids like in the minivan ads and the children's cough syrup ads, but by and large the nightly news is geared towards an older crowd.

Newspapers also remind me of middle age. To me, newspapers conjure up an image of a middle-aged man in a plaid bathrobe bought in 1971, sitting at a breakfast table, sucking down coffee while the dog runs off with his slippers. Reading a newspaper always reminds me of most of the adults I knew growing up.

Image aside, there are two general reasons I can't stand to watch the news these days. First of all, there is simply too much information out there for me to process on a day-to-day basis. Secondly, most of it is information that I would rather not know about.

However, when I'm on the cruise ship, I can go for days without hearing one iota of bad news because life on Cruise Ship College is simple and good. There are no wars, there are no homicidal maniacs, there are no famines, there are no rainforest fires, there are no refugees. Instead there's a lot of lusty young folks, looking good, dressing well and having fun. Food is in abundance, and freedom is there to be exercised.

I find that I am a much happier person when I don't know what's going on In the world. Some people may say that I am missing the point of college, that instead of living with a paper bag over my head, I should be expanding my view of the world.

In actuality, I am learning about the world — I just don't have any interest in keeping up with the daily course of events. I lack the background to truly make sense of the twentieth century the way my father can because he saw about 30 more years of current events than I have, and he can put today's current events into a better perspective than I can. Instead of keeping up with everything that happens daily, I would rather learn more about the background of an issue, information which is not always provided in a newspaper or on the nightly news.

My primary source of news these days is other people, and I usually find out my information after some personal embarrassment in a conversation. For example, when I was at a bar this summer, someone asked me what I thought about something that happened in Africa, and I had to confess ignorance and plead that I was on vacation and hadn't had a chance to watch the news.

In my mind, my whole college experience is a vacation from the world of adulthood. When I was growing up, I was still in an adult world where I had to follow the schedules and rules of teachers, parents, relatives and other adults. In a few more years, people will call me an adult, although secretly I will always be a kid. Right now, I'm on vacation aboard the cruise ship where life isn't perfect, but I'm happy anyway because I don't dwell on all of those problems that I didn't create and can't solve.

Our next point/counterpoint will run on Oct. 14. The topic will be: Is the smoking ban fair? Boston is implementing a smoking ban in all restaurants, and Amherst has their infamous smoking ban in all bars. Are these bans necessary? Do they infringe on smoker's rights? Do smokers have rights? We hope you can get a clear, concise 800 – 1000 word article into us as soon as possible. If you have any questions, feel free to call Mike or Alexis at 545–1491.

Great Balls

My mother tells me that too much of anything is not good. She's right. For the past six years I have worked at a private country club spilling out of the blue hills that separate Boston from the suburbs.

It was there that I experienced my first manual labor challenge at age 14. Members were chipping balls over the practice green into the woods and the head pro, Vinny Z., was responsible for making the club's ball supply last until the end of the season so the members wouldn't complain about a lack of balls. So he told me to build a fence and hang it twenty feet up, behind the green.

I went to where he told me the building materials would be and found a stack of plastic, orange snow fences, some yellow nylon rope, a pile of sand and a ten foot ladder. After ten minutes of walking around the materials I went back and asked Vinny for help. Vinny and I duct taped sheets of the plastic scrap into a limp, orange barrier and nailed it to a couple of trees.

"Those are the best balls on the market these days. Those are the best balls in the world. Great balls' he'd say."

Matt McLaughlin

I don't believe it ever had the chance to block any balls from the woods. The members avoided it altogether and would chip in the opposite direction with their backs to the mangy neon concoction. It came down one night a couple of weeks later in an average wind.

I toiled in the bag room cleaning clubs for three years and then moved up to work at the first tee for a guy named Matti M. Matti liked that I was quiet and did my work well, and he knew my brother, so I was on his good side. It was important to be on the good side of guy like Matti.

Matti behaved like a typical twelve-year-old wise ass. He ran the golf course like a mad king, often making a mockery of the country club. He had a hand held farting device that he held behind him and used when a member was talking to him. He would also make stupid faces at them when they turned around.

Matti was a married man around 50 years old with three daughters, but you'd never know it working with him. Unfortunately, I only lasted one summer at the first tee while Matti lasted two, but only because of his contract. After coming close to a beheading, Matti stepped down from his reign and became the course mechanic.

I then moved one door over to work in the Pro Shop with Vinny Z. Vinny was a drinker and got somewhere between tipsy and drunk nearly every night. Sometimes he got bombed. Usually he wouldn't start drinking until 4:30 or 5 p.m., but on rainy days when most members stayed home, he'd start hitting the bottle around one. Around 5 p.m. he'd stumble out from his office, his eyes and nose beaming with intoxication. This was after he had been back there attending to bills, thinking, and banging away at shots. He'd suggest a really asinine idea which would be perfectly logical to him at the time, like putting the shirts on the shorts rack and the shorts on the shirts rack. Then he'd ask me to do it.

I usually went along with Vinny's requests for the hell of it. He'd come out of his office an hour later and say it looked great. Chances were that he'd come in the next morning and have whoever was there put them back in place.

Vinny was a real Italian stallion, even in his late sixties. Every Friday afternoon he'd say he was going to the "bank," which was about a five minute drive, and return three hours later. I don't know how he did it at his age, but Vinny was still cashing checks and according to him, Viagra free.

Vinny knew how the golfer's mind worked. A member would pick up a sleeve of balls and ask him if they were any good. "Those are the best balls on the market these days. Those are the best balls in the world. Great balls," he'd say, regardless of what kind they had picked up. Same line every time. He was incredibly convincing. I once watched him sell socks the same way.

I don't play or care much for golf, so I wasn't much assistance to a customer looking for information about a product. After working in the shop for a decent while, I began to give out completely fictionalized information about the merchandise to the members. I'd keep making up new features and test results of a certain product and tell them la golf lingo, and they'd swallow the whole story. This turned out to be a fun game for me. Almost as fun as charging the account of a rude member for stuff they didn't buy.

After six years, I learned how to get away with things up there. But on Sept. 4, I punched out for the last time. I was even honest on my time card that day. In the span of my whole career up there I was only officially fired once, for one day, and I worked there for almost a third of my life. That's an absurd amount of time spent at a golf course for someone who doesn't play golf.

Matt McLaughlin is a UMass student.

Smoking ban here to stay

To the editor:

Since they charge by the hour, when a lawyer says "What is most important at this point is... reaching a compromise without litigation" (Daily Collegian, "Bars Still Defying Ban; A Compromise Sought," 9/23/98), he must not have much confidence in the merits of his case. Springfield Attorney Steve Winniman, representing a half- dozen bars defying the Amherst smoking ban, has nothing to show for the time and expense associated with the smoking war. A recent "compromise" proposal sent to the Chamber of Commerce was a complete waste of time for all concerned.

All of the items on the list had been proposed over the last two years and dismissed by the Board of Health. The reality for the bar-owners is that smoking is a thing of the past. I suggest they — and their clientele — get used to it.

More about Clinton

To the editor:

Although at times I have been at odds with the Clinton administration and some of its economic and foreign policy initiatives, I find myself in the odd position now of coming to bat for the man-child from Hope, Arkansas.

It is hard to believe that a personal indiscretion, especially a sexual peccadillo which reads like a bad B-movie, could even be considered an impeachable offense much less a high crime against the United States.

Aside from being forthcoming about an extramarital affair, what U.S. policies has the President subverted, undermining the will of the American people? Was the will of Congress or laws trampled upon the President? Hardly.

The last time the will of Congress was egregiously violated by the executive branch of government was with the Reagan/Bush administration and its secret sale of arms to Iran and the proceeds being secretly funneled to the Nicaraguan Contras, fighting to overthrow the Sandinsta Government of Nicaragua. Both components of the Iran- Contra transaction, sale of weapons to Iran and supply of lethal aid to the Contras at the time of the Boland Amendment prohibiting such assistance, were highly illegal.

A secret government of Oliver North, William Casey, John Poindexter, Robert McFarland and company were running a completely independent foreign policy apparatus outside of the law and the expressed will of the U.S. Congress.

Of course, the republican vice president, George Bush, "wasn't in the room," as was out of the loop the republican president, Ronald Reagan, who "couldn't remember."

High crimes and misdemeanors? Just look back ten years or so.

Clearly, Monica Lewinsky and President Clinton looking around on the Oval Office carpet for a cigar wrapper is not even close to being in the same league as Iran-Contra.

But then again, a lot seems to have changed in ten years.

Welcome to the threshold of the 21st Century, where sex has been criminalized and the new atom bomb is a young woman wearing a blue dress from the Gap. All bets are off.

Israeli kosher night held

By Matt Crocker
Collegian Correspondent

In honor of Sukkot, the harvest festival, the Hillel House hosted an Israel night at the kosher Dining Hall, this past Monday.

Featuring authentic and mouthwatering dishes of Israeli origin, the hungry students, who were able to partake in the event, were treated to a delicious and satisfying meal while commemorating the holiday. The menu consisted of a savory collection of delicacies including falafel, roast chicken, schuarma, schnitzel, baba ganoush, humus and Israel salad.

Sukkot night praises the success and progress put forth in agricultural enterprise. It encourages people to take time to remember what the earth has provided for them and understand that it must be shared by all. Sukkot instructs persons to cherish friendship, love, caring and concern for others. It is a time to connect with nature and basic human values while focusing on history.

Although only lasting for the duration of the dinner hours at the kosher Dining Hall, the production of Israel night began last semester. Israel night was coordinated between the Hillel House planning committee and kitchen staff as a means for students to get involved in the Sukkot celebration while also experiencing genuine cooking. All in all, the affair was a success as many diners, enticed by the appetite- whetting aromas and initial first tastings, frequented the tables where the food was available for seconds.

The man behind Israel night and all the meals served at the kosher Dining Commons is Nick DeRaleau. Graduating from New Hampshire Culinary Arts School, with honors in kosher food production, DeRelaeu is the head chef at the Hillel House and prepares food for an average of forty people per night.

"The kosher meal plan is as close to home cooking as you'll find at any university," said DeRelaeu.

Passionate about the food he puts forth for student consumption, DeRelaeu is often seen talking with visitors of the Dining Halls, inquiring about their opinions of the dinner. Mr. DeRelaeu takes a personal interest in the feelings of his customers and takes time to chat with them about their meal or even the ingredients to his personal falafel recipe.

Hillel hires a new JCSC Fellow to interact with Jewish students

By Morgan Tabor
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has a new Steinhart Jewish Campus Service/Hadassah (JCSC) Fellow, Julie Zuckerman. The job of the JCSC is a one year position to interact with Jewish students who wouldn't normally partake in Hillel activities or the Jewish communities on campus. There area about 155 JCSCs between Canada and the U.S., 85 positions of which are in the U.S. alone. The position is obtainable through a selective interview process.

Zuckerman plans on interacting with the UMass student body by means of tabling on the Campus Center concourse and attending student group meetings. The student group meetings range from Greek house meetings, freshman groups, graduate students, to the GLBT and others.

When meeting new students, the objective is to find what interests the students have pertaining to Jewish programs, both religious and social. Then she will aid in the design of a program to meet those needs. Julie does not plan the program herself, but encourages and works with the student to develop and plan according to the needs of the program itself and its members.

Zuckerman graduated in 1997 from the University of Maryland College Park with a bachelor's of arts degree in speech communication. As an active participant in Greek life at The University of Maryland College Park, Zuckerman served as president of the Northeastern Region Panhellenic Conference.

Last year, Zuckerman went abroad to Israel participating in Project Otzmah. (The direct translation of Otzmah means "power.") Aside from traveling, Zuckerman lived on a kibbuz, served in the Israeli national army, taught English to Jews and helped build a community.

Project Otzmah is a highly selective program for graduate students. The program was designed to help bridge the gap between the Israelis and those of the Diaspora. Jews not living in Israel. Zuckerman said that her year with project Otzmah was the hardest thing she's ever done, but also the best thing that she has ever done.

Aware of "Cultural Judaism," Zuckerman sought out the position of the JCSC to find the "religious side" of Judaism, explaining it was "to help other people find what they like about the Jewish religion other than high holiday services and Hebrew school, where most association of Judaism comes from."

Zuckerman can be reached at the Hillel House or tabling at least once a week either Mondays or Thursday on the Campus Center concourse. For further information, contact Julie at the Hillel House 388 N. Pleasant St. at 549–1710.

Hillel Hosts "Coffee Talk"

On Tuesday, Oct. 6, 8:30 p.m., Hillel is having an open mic coffeehouse. The night is a celebration of songs, poetry, stories, etc. Students with all levels of talent, and anyone interested in meeting new people, hearing music and other creative forms of expression are invited. Performances do not require Jewish talent, all subjects are welcome. Bring yourself and your friends for a chill cultural and social evening. Meet people from all of the five colleges. The coffeehouse will be located downstairs at the Hillel house, 388 N. Pleasant St. For further information, call the Hillel House at 549–1710.

The guilt of breaking the fast

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Today I ate breakfast. And I will eat lunch — maybe even a few snacks. But I will eat with spiritual reluctance. My body will be screaming at me to replenish its glucose stores, while my mind and my spirit will be calling me back to the foundations I have uprooted.

For six years, I have followed one of the most important proclamations of my religion, fasting on Yom Kippur. The Day of Atonement in Jewish tradition, Yom Kippur marks the culmination of the ten days of repentance which began with Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish new year. A day to be spent in introspection, asking forgiveness for sins committed throughout the year, Yom Kippur is considered by some to be the most critical day in the Jewish calendar.

The fast which runs from sundown the night before Yom Kippur to sundown the night of Yom Kippur is one of the five forms of affliction associated with the holiday. Aside from the prohibition from eating and drinking, Jews are not sanctioned to do work, wash for pleasure, anoint the body with perfumes, wear leather shoes or have marital relations. While not all Jews follow all parts of the tradition, the fast is generally viewed as the most important of Yom Kippur practices, and the majority of practicing Jewish adults participate in the fast.

But, for medical reasons, I will not fast this year. My God will forgive me, but I just can't seem to do the same. In the Jewish religion, if fasting presents a danger to one's life (pikuach nefesh), it is not permitted. If I fast this year, I can't predict what my bodily response will be.

For three months, my body has been shaking desperately at random times, seemingly in need of food. My mouth dry, waves of nausea overcoming me, I have tried to understand what my body is trying to tell me. Right now, it seems to be whispering "hypoglycemia" — a condition in which blood glucose levels drop too low to fuel bodily activity. If that is the case, a day of not eating could possibly render me unconscious.

My nose feels smashed in from the repeated punches in the face my mortality has been giving me. Yom Kippur is my chance to be written in the book of life for another year, and I can't help but think that I might not make the cut.

For me, unexplained illness has begun a process of questioning, of both myself and my God. I yearn for an emergency broadcast system message from a higher power reminding me that this is only a test, and that all I have to do to pass is believe.

Religion isn't an easy as it was when I was 12, before I started fasting, and before I had to consider what it meant to do so. The fast is a practice done because during a period of high spiritual understanding, such as Yom Kippur, a Jew shouldn't need food for sustenance. Instead, there is God.

But what does it mean to not be able to fast? It means nothing to God — if it could possibly kill you, you probably shouldn't do it. But what doesn't kill us makes us stronger, and the role of strength is the role that the Yom Kippur fast played for me in the past.

Today, I will miss the feeling of purity and the reminder of a chance to begin again that fasting gave me. I will have to search elsewhere during my personal breaking of the fast for that higher spiritual sense. Maybe I'll find it at lunch.

Jews begin to prepare for Sukkot

By Renee Conn
Collegian Correspondent

Do you remember how much fun camping was as a kid? It was a time to enjoy sleeping under the stars, appreciating the beauty of nature and just getting away from the business of a hectic life. Food would taste better in the fresh air, you would read books without being forced and you would even get excitement from things in nature that you may have never noticed before.

Every year, in the beginning of fall, Jews around the world celebrate Sukkot. It is a joyous holiday, that among many honored traditions, can be considered a kind of "Jewish camping holiday."

Walking around campus, you may have seen all sorts of signs for Jewish holidays — Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkot. Right now, Jews are in the midst of what is called the "High Holidays." These are the most religious of the holy days, when we slow down from the pace of everyday life and reflect on ourselves. Today is Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement and the more somber of the holidays, a time of reflection and solemn prayer. Sunday, Oct. 4 begins a holiday of much celebration and joy — Sukkot, the holiday of the harvest.

Sukkot was once the most important festival of the year. The importance of the harvest was second to none. The significance of Sukkot has not been lost, for it is still very much celebrated today. There are many customs followed on and before Sukkot; each custom depicts a connection to the earth, and is a mitzvah, or a blessing, to perform.

The most important tradition associated with Sukkot is the building of the Sukkah. A Sukkah is a temporary house, or booth, and is constructed with a roof of branches spread out enough so that the stars can be seen through the roof. The structure serves as the focal point throughout the holiday. Weather permitting, it is considered a blessing to sleep, eat, study, talk and relax underneath the Sukkah. Some people think of Sukkot as a camping holidas for this very reason. The Sukkah is a place for Jews to get in touch with themselves as well as with God.

During Sukkot, a lulav and etrog are used. The lulav, or palm branch, is taken from either a myrtle or willow tree. The lulav and the etrog, a citron, are shaken in all four sides of the Sukkah, symbolizing the gathering of the four species from the four ends of the earth. They emphasize the agricultural nature of Sukkot.

The University of Massachusetts is doing much to celebrate Sukkot. Tomorrow, Oct. 1 at 3 p.m., a Sukkah will be constructed in the courtyard area of the Hillel House. All are welcome to join in the building of the structure.

On the eve of Sukkot, those on the Interfaith Journey to New York City will be constructing a Sukkah. On the same day, there will be services inside the Hillel Sukkah beginning at 6 p.m. Dinner will follow services.

On Monday, Oct. 5, there will be services involving the Jewish Community of Amherst in the Hillel House beginning at 10 a.m. Services are followed by a free lunch in the Sukkah.

Israel to turn over 13 percent more of West Bank

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat said after meeting with President Clinton today that he has accepted a proposal under which Israel would turn over another 13 percent of the West Bank.

Arafat said he hopes a West Bank agreement can be concluded in October.

Under the latest proposal, 3 percent of the land that Israel yields back would be turned into a nature preserve under joint Israeli-Palestinian security oversight. "We have accepted it," Arafat said.

Clinton saw him to the White House driveway and shook hands with the Palestinian leader several times for the benefit of photographers.

Now that Israel has agreed to give up 13 percent of the West Bank on top of 27 percent promised in past accords, the focus of U.S. mediation shifts to whether Arafat would provide the kind of security concerns to seal a deal with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat quoted Arafat as saying "he will make every possible effort." A White House official told reporters the Palestinian leader had reviewed with Clinton his speech Monday to the U.N. General Assembly in which Arafat called for an end to terrorism.

Clinton has set up a schedule aimed at concluding the West Bank agreement by mid-October. And Arafat said he hoped there could be a signing by then.

Clinton talked alone with Arafat for about 20 minutes, and together with senior aides, including Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and national security adviser Sandy Berger, for 40 minutes, said the White House official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

There was no statement or picture-taking as Arafat called on Clinton in the Oval Office.

Declaring Israel's concern for security was "justified," White House spokesman Mike McCurry said "the president is determined to see an agreement arise" from his series of talks and mediation leading up to a summit here in mid-October.

On the contested West Bank, meanwhile, a car rigged with explosives blew up today in an industrial area, killing an activist in the Hamas organization and wounding two other supporters of the Islamic militant group that takes responsibility for bloody attacks in Israel, Palestinian police said.

Israel has been bracing for a renewal of Hamas bombings, and today sealed its borders with the West Bank and Gaza Strip ahead of the Jewish holiday of Yom Kippur to try to deter violence. On Monday, Netanyahu confirmed at the White House that he was relinquishing the Jewish state's claim to more land on the West Bank provided it would not be used as a base for attacks on Israel. Before flying home to Israel for Yom Kippur, Netanyahu underscored his willingness to take the political risk and insisted the Palestinians must reciprocate by stopping terror against Israel. He avoided, at the same time, responding to Palestinian claims to the land for a state.

The key provision accepted by Netanyahu would bring withdrawal by Israel from 13 percent of the land captured from Jordan in the 1967 Six-Day War. That would be on top of 27 percent already pledged to the Palestinian Authority along with most of the Gaza Strip.

Clinton, acting as mediator, set up a schedule for reaching a West Bank agreement during the three-way session Monday with Netanyahu and Arafat in the Oval Office.

"I believe that we all agreed that we have made progress on the path to peace," he said.

Clinton directed Albright to go to the region next week for talks with Netanyahu and Arafat, who have been dueling over the future of the West Bank for nearly two years, after which the Mideast leaders would return to the White House.

"Jewish Writes: A Personal Midrash" encourages spiritual, personal expression

By Chanel Dubofsky
Collegian Correspondent

When was the last time you felt disconnected from your Judaism? Was it at your aunt's Passover seder when you actually let your cousin find the afikomen without putting up a fight? Or was it during Rosh Hashanah when you found yourself skipping services and actually going to class?

If you're interested in reconnecting with that part of you who loved Israeli dancing, sang camp songs until your throat was raw and couldn't wait to help your bubbe prepare Shabbat dinner, then perhaps "Jewish Writes: A Personal Midrash," is for you.

"Jewish Writes" will take place on Thursday, Oct. 8 at the Hillel House at 7 p.m. Local poet and psychotherapist Dinah Kudatsky will facilitate this workshop, which may include guided meditation exercises, a collective poem incorporating Hebrew and Yiddish as well as working with memory through an object of Jewish and personal significance.

Kudatsky hopes that both those who are from traditional backgrounds and who are searching for spiritual paths will attend the workshop, encouraging an atmosphere diversity.

"For however many Jews there are, that's how many Jewish experiences there can be," said Kudatsky, who describes herself as a "New York escapee," raised in a traditional home, where she felt it was difficult to ask questions about issues such as feminism.

Today, Kudatsky feels that her connection to Judaism is cultural, religious and familial. However, she believes that one's identification with their Judaism is entirely individual.

She compares personal and spiritual fulfillment to a smorgasbord, "picking and choosing what feeds you the most... there is so much, and each person must find what they need to put on their plate to nourish themselves... and there is a place for every kind of Jew at the table."

The subtitle of Kudatsky's workshop, "A Personal Midrash," also eludes to the theme of spiritual fulfillment. A Midrash is an explanation, and in this case, an explanation reached through contemplation, and ongoing conversations with culture, which according to Kudatsky can be "an argument or a love letter."

"Jewish Writes: A Personal Midrash," is free and open to the Five College community.

Participants are asked to bring a personal meaningful object with them, and to register by Oct. 2 at Hillel by calling 549–1710.

For those fasting today for Yom Kippur — have a safe and spiritual fast.

Black leaves listeners begging for mercy

FRANK BLACK AND THE CATHOLICS
Frank Black and the Catholics
SpinArt

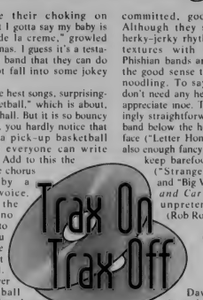
Oh Frank, Frank, Frank... What in the world happened to you? You used to actually care about your music.

Frank Black and the Catholics is lame and boring, reducing the once mighty Black Francis to a pathetic shell of his former self. "All My Ghosts," the opening track of the album gets things off to a false start. The album hobbles along with songs like "Dog Gone" and "Six Sixty-Six," one track indistinguishable from the next. The Pixies broke up because the individual band members wanted creative freedom, but everything they have done since the demise of the band has been less than spectacular. I'll just sit and wait for a reunion, but I won't hold my breath. D– (Kevin Monahan)

THE WAY WE WERE
Babe the Blue Ox
RCA

Motion is a constant theme that runs through Babe the Blue Ox's new album, The Way We Were. From the name of the album, to the two songs about trains and "Mensy" dedicated to their van, to the album art on the back that looks like a train line, the album is obsessed with getting from here to there. It doesn't say that much about moving, but it's obsessed nonetheless.

This is a strange, dichotomous album. There are songs of sheer beauty and songs that are scuzzy in their blues- infected rhythm. "My Baby 'N' Me" starts off the album with a strong groove, while singer Tim Thomas sings "There's only three things that I would never give up/ My records, my car and my buttercup." I think I hear Hallmark calling. This is a song that treads dangerously close to self- parody with lines like "The French might sound like their choking on phlegm/ But I gotta say my baby is the creme de la creme," growled out by Thomas. I guess it's a testament to the band that they can do this and not fall into some jokey niche.



One of the best songs, surprisingly, is "Basketball," which is about, well, basketball. But it is so bouncy and vibrant, you hardly notice that it's about a pick-up basketball game. Not everyone can write about that. Add to this the fact that the chorus is sung by a female voice decrying the fact that no one passes to her and you really have to respect this band. Maybe. Never has roundball been rendered so vibrant. Well, not since Skee-Lo (I wish I were a little bit taller, too).

There are also moments so gorgeous, it's a surprise it's the same band. "Heartbreak #1" begins with the lines "First loves/ Float above/ Like angels taking notes." It could be the highlight of the album.

Like I said, this could be an album that drowns in it's own cuteness and cleverness. "T.G.I.F.U." name checks just too many restaurants in too many wannabe clever ways to be taken seriously. ("Hooters girls are shakin' fanny/ Fuddruckin' every nook and cranny" — come on, guys...) All in all, though, this album gets jiggy wit it. If only we could all get jiggy wit it, this world would be a better place. B+ (Mike Messaros) moe.

Northeastern band moe. are on the verge of being just another committed, goofy jam outfit. Although they share a love of herky-jerky rhythms and layered textures with the armies of Phishian bands around, moe. have the good sense to resist rootless noodling. To say it simply, you don't need any herbal help to fully appreciate moe. There is a refreshingly straightforward rock 'n' roll band below the hemp-friendly surface ("Letter Home" and "It") and also enough fancy guitar doodles to keep barefoot dancers happy ("Stranger Than Fiction" and "Big World"). Tin Cans and Car Tires is sweet, unpretentious music. B (Rob Roensch)

GENTLEMAN'S BLUES
Cracker
Virgin

David Lowery continues his transformation towards becoming the Tom Petty of the next millennium on Gentleman's Blues. Him and Johnny Hideman are adept at creating solid country-rock tunes. This time around, the theme centers around what it is like to be in a band.

"Seven Days" is all about life on the road. Ever since the success of Kerosene Hat's "Low," Lowery and company have travelled a winding road in search of a repeat of that hit, while moving forward musically. Gentleman's Blues comes from somewhere in the middle of that journey. "The World is Mine" tries to be this album's "Low" and pales in comparison. Lowery needs to move on from that chapter in Cracker's existence and focus on being the serious musician he toys with on the new album.

The Tom Petty comparison pretty much says it all, strengthened by appearances from Petty's bandmates: Benmont Tench on keyboards and Mike Campbell on guitars. The blueprint for Cracker's future can be found amongst these Gentleman's Blues. The days of "what the world needs now is another folk singer" appear to be behind Cracker, but the new direction is equally entertaining. B (Matthew Nixon)

BUGZY
Bugzy
Iguana

Modern rock lends itself to stuff like Bugzy. This is where Bugzy belongs — on a playlist for a couple of weeks before slipping from memory forever. Many stations seized upon "Pizza" immediately with its description of sitting alone in "bikini briefs" and being stoned. "If you ever come back could you bring a pizza?/It's getting late. I'm getting kind of hungry" is worthy of a laugh the first time, but that's about it. Generic and bland. D (M.N.)

CHICKENEYE
DeeJay Punk-Roc
ISOM

Right away, "I Hate Everybody" grabs your attention. With all of its samples and breakneck beats, ChickenEye is a delight. Although this kind of experimentation is nothing new, DeeJay Punk-Roc pulls it off nicely. This is a CD to check out if only for the sheer fun of it. B+ (K.M.)

HOLIDAY MAN
The Flys
Trauma

Somewhere between the West-Coast hounce of Sublime and the generic rock of Matchbox 20 exists The Flys. The highlight of Holiday Man is the single "Got You Where I Want You," a catchy, ringing number with Katie Holmes in the video. The rest of the disc is like an episode of Baywatch — completely forgettable. Say goodbye to The Flys. D+ (R.R.)

Liz Phair's new style makes for a refreshing change.

WHITECHOCOLATESPACEEGG
Liz Phair

Just like Madonna, Liz Phair has sculpted a career out of scandal. Not to the extent that Madonna has, but in a low- key, indie-rock sort of way. And now, just like Madonna, her new work comes under scrutiny due to the fact that she has become a mom. Does this change her outlook, the way she writes or presents herself? Is it going to be hard for her when the kid grows up and she has to hear, "Look! This is mommy's first album! And there's mommy's breast!"

I never really bought into the first two albums. The much lauded Exile in Guyville went over my head as a young high schooler, and as much as I liked Whip-Smart's bouncier soul, I still wasn't effected by Phair's "look how naughty I am" histrionics (a harsh word, I know, but a nice long one that makes my critical vocabulary look larger than it really is).

So let the questions begin. Has motherhood changed her? Is she still relevant in the age of Shirles Manson and Alanis? Was it worth the four years it took to make the album? Who cares. What has taken four years to craft comes as a long sigh of relief. The songwriting has flourished and the album retains a laser sharp focus, while still being all over the place (nicely so). The title track has a spacey feel and sets the tone well. What's amazing is that she can go from an experimental feel to a hushed, intimate one without ever losing balance or a feel for consistency. "Headache" rides a couple of keyboards and a looping sample of someone exhaling, while "Uncle Alvarez" has a simple acoustic feel to

Ronin stays neutral

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

RONIN
Directed by John Frankenheimer with Robert DeNiro, Jean Reno, Stellan Skarsgard
Playing at Hampshire Mall Cinemas

Ronin is an incredibly bleak movie dressed up as an action adventure. The plot is simple enough: a group of highly-trained, covert operatives gather in France to steal a silver suitcase. Thankfully, Ronin is much more than the BMW commercials James Bond movies have turned into.

Unlike Bond, the movie presents a dull and cramped France. The sky always seems to be a flat grey, and the French cities are like decaying stone mazes. Further, the technology that the operatives use is not dwelled on — no shiny, futuristic guns or complicated techno-toys. Espionage is not fun. The operatives don't float around in a magical haze of dry one-liners, they struggle.

Also, the operatives do not fight for a cause or country, but only for themselves. The word "ronin" means samurai who have lost their lord. Not only are the operatives separated from their homes, but they don't seem to care about the contents of the suitcase either. In an important twist, we never see what is inside. The chase would be the same whether they were chasing missile plans or a handful of watermelon gumballs. The money that the operatives receive can't be the only reason that they put themselves so readily into danger.

So why do these operatives insist on the struggle? In some sense, it's the only way of life for them. The most lyrical, involving scenes in the film, are the physical chases, including some great speeding car scenes where the camera is bolted to the hood. It feels like flying. Although the operatives drive like lucky demons, they can barely have a conversation or do anything "normal." It's impossible, for example, to imagine Robert DeNiro's character mowing the lawn and then taking the kids to Pizza Hut. The abandoned Cold-War operatives subscribe to a vanishing warrior code that is more important than both ordinary life and the people around them. What happens when warriors outlive the war? This is only one of the difficult questions Ronin asks.

Like Casablanca, Ronin explores the issue of moral neutrality. In their grim, obsessive pursuit of the suitcase, the operatives alter the balance of power between several political organizations in Europe. They don't mean to be good guys or bad guys, but, in the end, do their intentions even matter?

To its credit, Ronin shows us the grimy underbelly of ordinary action movies, where painless explosions bloom like pretty orange flowers and everyone has something witty to say. Minor problems, however, keep Ronin from coming completely together.

First, the operatives shoot all sorts of people in public places and raise an incredible ruckus, yet they are never followed by the police or even act worried or careful. They hang out in bars and hotels with the ease of tourists, which seems a little ridiculous for such meticulously-trained experts. There's no threat of capture hanging over their heads, where there should be.

Second, although Ronin shows the less flashy aspects of the operatives' lives, it rushes right by the deaths of bystanders without a backward glance just like every other action movie. The operatives are never made accountable for anything.

Lastly, Ronin is simply too bleak. A world so monotonous is hard to care about. If the movie's one final flash of warmth wasn't saved until the very end, the operatives actions and sins would have resonated and Ronin would add up to more than just obsessed, indifferent people fighting over a shiny suitcase. B- it. "What Makes You Happy" switches between a simply strummed verse and a bouncy, techno-y chorus to create an exhilarating whole.

All in all, this album proves that Phair does not need shock to be a vital artist. More than once she sings a phrase so concise and so beautiful, you wonder why she even wanted to say that someone could "rent her by the hour," as she did on one of her previous efforts. Overshadowing that on this album are lines like "I see the sky before me like a full recovery" (on "What Makes You Happy") or "And it feels good/ Like relieving a headache" (on "Big Tall Man").

Phair's new album can be seen as a transition from footnote to hallmark. Her new style, confessional as always, is more willing to talk than shock, and makes for one of the more surprising albums of the year. But after four years, it'd better be. A

Brown outduels the Big Unit, 2–1; Wakefield gets the ball in Game 2

HOUSTON (AP) — The marquee matchup between Randy Johnson and Kevin Brown lived up to expectations — close, tense and full of strikeouts.

The kicker, though, was that Brown did an awesome imitation of Johnson, showing up the Big Unit in the Astrodome as the San Diego Padres beat the Houston Astros 2-1 in the opening game of their NL division series.

Brown struck out 16 and allowed just two hits in eight innings in a brilliant performance as the Padres stole home-field advantage in the best-of-5 series.

Brown's strikeouts were the most ever in division series play and just one short of Bob Gibson's postseason record 17 in the 1968 World Series.

The right-hander said this was a bigger game than the no-hitter he pitched for the Florida Marlins in 1997.

"I'll take this one any time because of the impact of the situation," he said. "Being in the regular season, that didn't have the meaning for the team that this one did."

Astros manager Larry Dierker said Brown was "as dominant as you can be, other than a pitching a no-hitter. There wasn't more he could have done."

Both aces were obtained in trades to try to get their teams to the World Series. Brown was there last year, winning a ring with Florida, but became expendable along with the other high-priced Marlins and was snapped up for three prospects.

The Astros got Johnson from the Seattle Mariners at the July 31 trading deadline. No one likes facing Johnson, and the Astros found out how brutal it can be facing Brown.

"It was a very dominating performance," said Johnson, who has lost his last four postseason decisions.

"Now I know why a lot of the hitters drag their bats back," added Johnson, who struck out 12 Padres in an interleague game on June 24. "He defies the law of gravity with the pitches he throws. With his forkball and sinker, it's no fun facing a guy like that, so I can imagine what it's like for our hitters who were dialed in and focused."

Brown's previous strikeout high was 11, which he did three times in his final 11 regular-season starts.

Brown, 18-7 during the regular season, beat Atlanta's Greg Maddux and Tom Glavine in last year's NL championship series despite being weakened by the flu, and now has added Johnson to his list.

Brown said his job was to concentrate on the hitters, not on Johnson.

"Thank goodness I did a good job," Brown said. "That was my focus and I did that probably as well as I've done it in quite some time."

Johnson had been practically untouchable at home, going 5-0 — the first four wins were shutouts — since coming over to the Astros.

Trevor Hoffman, who tied the NL record this season with 53 saves, allowed an unearned run on two hits in the ninth.

Bill Spiers led off with a double, and two outs later, Moises Alou hit an infield single that third baseman Ken Caminiti stopped, but threw wide of first to allow the run to score.

Game 2 is tomorrow with the Padres starting Andy Ashby (17-10) against Shane Reynolds (19-8).

San Diego's offense had struggled all September, but had nine hits in eight innings off Johnson. And with the NL Central champion Astros flailing at Brown's usual assortment of hard pitches with a lot of movement, the Padres won a postseason game for the first time since 1984.

Greg Vaughn, who hit his 50th homer in his final regular-season at-bat Sunday night, provided the difference when he homered to left on a slider leading off the eighth inning to give San Diego a 2-0 lead. It was his third hit off Johnson.

Jim Leyritz hit a bases-loaded sacrifice fly in the sixth inning to score Tony Gwynn, the only player left from San Diego's 1984 World Series team.

Brown had been 0-2 with two no-decisions in his previous four starts despite allowing just seven earned runs in 30 innings. Houston's Killer B's — Craig Biggio, Derek Bell and Jeff Bagwell — were a combined 0-for-10 with seven strikeouts.

Johnson was 10-1 for the Astros in the regular season. He went eight innings yesterday, striking out eight and walking one. The NL West champion Padres finally broke through against Johnson in the sixth, when they loaded the bases with no outs on Gwynn's opposite-field double over third baseman Spiers' glove, Vaughn's infield single to third and Caminiti's broken-bat, bloop single to right that fell in just past the reach of second baseman Craig Biggio.

Leyritz, a right-hander starting for left-handed first baseman Wally Joyner, lifted a sacrifice fly to the warning track in center field.

Wakefield ready to go in Game Two

CLEVELAND (AP) — Tim Wakefield's knuckleball is baffling even when he has nothing else going for him.

It can be even tougher for hitters on a warm day with the wind blowing out after having faced Pedro Martinez and his 95 mph fastball the previous game.

That day could come today when Wakefield pitches for the Boston Red Sox in Game 2 of the best-of-5 AL division series against the Cleveland Indians. Martinez won his career playoff debut in Boston's 11-3 victory yesterday.

Wakefield figures at least half his career-high 36 regular-season starts this year came against the same team Martinez faced the day before.

"It helped out quite a bit," Wakefield said. "After Pedro throws 95 mph, following him I'm throwing 65, 70."

Actually, the Red Sox were just 10-8 in such games, although Wakefield (17-8) noticed batters struggling to adjust to the change in styles. And his style works better when the weather is warm, as it's expected to be today, since his effectiveness depends on how well he can feel the ball with his fingertips.

"Having it cold is like trying to throw an ice cube sometimes," he said before yesterday's opener. "It doesn't feel comfortable."

The wind also is a factor because of "the physics of the knuckleball," he said. When there is some resistance to the pitch, as when the breeze is blowing out, it changes direction more.

"Being a knuckleball pitcher, there's not a whole lot of room for error," Wakefield said. "I'm relying on movement vs. velocity."

Surprisingly, catcher Jason Varitek said, the more movement, the less trouble he has holding on to the ball. He'll get a chance to prove that today when he catches Wakefield for the fourth straight game.

"Sometimes when his ball moves the most, it moves the most consistent and it's easier to catch," said Varitek, who never caught a knuckleball pitcher before Wakefield. "When he's comfortable and gets a good feel, I also have a good feel."

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — It's a good day to give back what you've recently gained from others. Your generosity is directly related to the rewards you receive.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Your personal power is on the rise, and you should be able to fashion quite a dramatic rise from your current position in little time at all.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Social activities not only increase in number and scope at this time, but bring you more chances to multiply pleasure and profit.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Issues concerning family ties dominate today. You won't be able to ignore domestic issues.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Take things one at a time today, and you'll be amazed how quickly you're able to dispense with your major duties.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You've been so concerned with appearances lately you've completely ignored a hard-and-fast reality begging for attention at home. Attend to it.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take the initiative today, and don't be afraid to ask for what you need. A willingness to explain yourself will get you far.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Your ambition is increasing, and you're getting closer to achieving a major goal. Beware of dangers you soon won't be able to avoid.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Long-distance communication is essential to successfully performing your duties at the workplace — and at home. Don't hold your emotions back!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may be unaware of a major danger that lurks around the corner. Take the time to consider your next steps with care.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Someone may be getting a little too close at this time. Don't hesitate to draw a line when your discomfort begins to grow.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Unexpected developments abound today, but you're equipped to stay on top of it at this time. Don't be overly aggressive!

The end of the race; the start of the postseason

Last week my 320-pound buddy Pratter came by the suite for a little Thursday night consumption of his new love, the Three Stooges Brew. After annihilating our livers for two hours, he started to ramble drunk nonsense about how Dale Murphy and Dave Kingman have 500 home runs, and how Andre Dawson has 3000 hits.

So we (me and suitemate C2) pulled out the sports almanac, and needless to say big Pratter was wrong about all three. We found out that Dale Murphy had around 380 career home runs (don't hold me to that number, though ... and that relaxed wheel in my head began to turn. I realized that Mark McGwire has hit 180 home runs in the past three seasons. That's almost half of Murphy's career total — and he was a former MVP and pretty damn good power hitter in his day.

It's the little things like those stats which make Big Mac's 70-home run season unforgettable. When I was a pudgy little lad growing up in Holyoke, I used to worship Mike Greenwell after he hit 39 home runs for the Sox in 1988. I thought he was the next Yaz. Back then, 39 homers was a monster season.

In 1991, when Cecil Fielder became the first guy in 14 years to hit 50 (George Foster hit 52 in 1977 for the Reds), he made the front page of my local paper.

Now try to fathom the 70 Big Mac just hit. Guess what? I don't think most of us can. Nor will most of us ever see anything like it again (nor anyone else.

Yeah, so Sammy Sosa hit 66, and brought attention to a home run chase which should have ended at 62. But he's not Mark McGwire. He did not fill empty stadiums until the latter portion of the season, and he never received the reception Big Mac has all year. The Florida Marlins didn't even sell out Pro Player Stadium for the one of the opening two games of the World Series last season. Big Mac filled the place during a two-game, four home run stint in late August. Let's see Sosa do that.

When ESPN flashed the highlights of No.'s 69 and 70 during the Cubs/Astros game on Sunday, my whole family went wild. My uncle, however, reminded me that there was one thing missing from making 1998 a season to remember... and let's just say, there hasn't been a season to remember since 1918. I can think of only one consolation: At least my uncle and I are not Cubs fans.

- As for the Sox, they begin a best-of-five-games series at Cleveland this week. After spotting an 8-3 mark against the Tribe this season, the Beantown Boys may have found the perfect playoff tonic to break out of their September slump.

Saykin's pick: Sox in 4.

- The Yankees face a much more difficult opening round opponent in the form of the Texas Rangers — who rank among the AL's hottest teams. What a way to reward the best team in American League history. This '98 squad is too good to get ousted in the opening round, but look for Texas to put up a fight.

Saykin's pick: Yanks in 5.

- Although most Brave fans were praying for the Giants win the wild card, they'll have to contend with Sosa and company as well as the home run friendly Wrigley Field. There's just something about this Cubs team I like, and there's just something about the Braves that I'm sick of seeing.

Saykin's pick: Cubs in 5.

- And the final series may be the best. It's a shame that the Astros and Padres have to meet in the first round, because both of these teams are good enough to win the World Series. Houston ace Randy Johnson will make at least two starts if necessary. That's two wins for the Astros, and a trip to the NLCS.

Saykin's pick: Astros in 4.

- Now that I have made my bold first-round predictions, I might as well go out on a limb and pick my World Series champ.

In the AL, Boston and New York will leave us with a memorable series. As I predicted two weeks ago, Mike Benjamin will win game seven for the Sox with a unmighty Bucky Dent shot into the Yankee bullpen.

Saykin's pick: Sox in 7.

Over in the NL, Houston will be too much for a pesky Chicago team. Cubs' fans have waited 90 years for a title, so what's one more?

Saykin's pick: "Strus in 5."

And then the Grand Finale. The Sox and Astros were destined to meet in 1986, but the Mets spoiled things. On the 50th Anniversary of the Bambino's death, I feel he shall finally lift the curse.

Saykin's pick: Sox World Champs in 6 games.

UMass men's tennis begins '98 with wins

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team began its season on the right foot, beating the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 4-3. Despite losing the doubles point, the team rallied to claim four of the six singles points.

Leading the Minutemen was senior Todd Cheney at the number two seed, who won a hard-fought victory in straight sets, 6-4, 6-4. Sophmore Fabian Rabanal had a decisive victory at the number three seed, winning 6-1, 6-4.

UMass head coach Judy Dixon was impressed with Rabanal's play.

"Fabian played very well today," said Dixon. "I think he felt like he had something to prove since he was not in doubles play. He was aggressive when he needed to be and his intensity was maintained throughout."

Also notching victories for the maroon and white were junior Bo Navarro at the number five seed and freshman Eric Reblin at the number six seed.

"In order for UMass to win we must win at the four through six seeds," said Dixon. "That is our strength. We won this match at number two [Cheney] and number six [Reblin]. I don't like to put that kind of pressure on a freshman."

Reblin responded to the pressure by handling his opponent in straight sets, 6-4, 6-3.

The team dropped two of the three doubles matches with the sole win coming from the tandem of Cheney and junior Parsa Samii. Dixon cited doubles play as one of the weaknesses in the team plays.

"In doubles I am working it out and trying different combinations until we find the right thing," said Dixon. "It is not that we lack the talent. I just haven't found the right combinations yet and that is my responsibility."

One of the high points in doubles play was the efforts of Cheney and Samii, playing at the number two seed, they won handily, 8-2.

"Number two doubles played very well together, winning quite easily," Dixon said. "That is impressive since the two have never played together before."

Cheney, the team's lone senior, was a little disappointed by the outing.

"It was our first win of the year, but our doubles play was a little flat and our intensity was a little low," said Cheney. "We have a lot of new players. This is a team [MIT] we should beat 6-1."

Cheney was not fully pleased with his own efforts either.

"I played well in doubles, but I was a little flat in singles," said Cheney. "I wasn't concentrating."

Number one seed Rob Manchester lost a grueling three set match to MIT number one, Eric Chen. Manchester won the first set 6-4, but Chen seemed to get stronger and more confident as the match went on, winning the following two sets 6-3.

"It is very tough to play number one at UMass," said Dixon. "Rob has no confidence right now. He is thinking tentatively. You must be totally confident to play at number one otherwise the other number one will take advantage."

The UMass team will take to the courts again this Friday in their second match of the season against the University of Vermont.

Mo Vaughn propels Red Sox over Indians in 11-3 blowout

CLEVELAND (AP) — Mo's moment couldn't have come at a better time.

Three years after striking out seven times in his first playoff series, Mo Vaughn tied a major league postseason record with seven RBIs yesterday. And Boston's other hitting star, Nomar Garciaparra, wasn't far behind with four RBIs.

But Garciaparra knew who meant the most to the Red Sox.

"Wow," he said of Vaughn's seven RBIs in the 11-3 win over the Cleveland Indians in the opener of a division playoff. "Is that good enough? A tremendous performance. Mo has been our leader all year."

In 1995, though, Vaughn went 0-for-14 as the Red Sox were swept by the Indians in a three-game division series.

At his first opportunity yesterday, Vaughn changed that and started his team on the way to snapping its 13-game postseason losing streak. He hit a three-run homer in the top of the first.

"To be able to do it in the first inning and erase all the critics or the doubt if would we be able to do anything, I'm sure it gave him a lift, but it gave us as a team a tremendous lift," said Boston designated hitter Mike Stanley. "It just broke the ice for everybody and let us relax."

Vaughn, a team leader with his personality as well as his play, was far from done.

He added a two-run homer in the sixth. In the eighth, he hit a two-run double off Jim Poole, the only lefty he faced. In the regular season, the lefty Vaughn batted .333 against lefties and .358 against righties.

And now he's started to erase memories of his playoff flop.

"I just wanted to get an opportunity to get here again," Vaughn said. "I'm a little older now and more experienced. The biggest thing is to look at situations like that and learn from them."

He learned not to be overanxious. If the pitch is off the plate, don't swing. If it's on the outside corner, hit to the opposite field, as he did on his first homer.

Vaughn struck out in the fifth, but Garciaparra, the cleanup hitter, followed with a three-run homer. He also drove in Boston's last run with a sacrifice fly in the eighth.

"It's tough to lose the first game in a short series," Cleveland left fielder Brian Giles said. "Mo and Nomar, those are two you've got to watch and they beat us."

Vaughn had been building toward a strong playoff series. He hit safely in his last 16 regular-season games, matching his career high. In Sunday's finale, he made a charge for the batting title by going 2-for-4 and finishing at .337. But Bernie Williams of the New York Yankees went 2-for-2 and won it at .339. Vaughn still finished with 40 homers and 115 RBIs.

In the first inning yesterday, Jaret Wright got ahead 0-and-2 to Vaughn, who then laid off the next three pitches.

Would the 1995 Vaughn have been so restrained?

"He probably would have swung at all of them," Vaughn said, "but fighting for the batting title the past two weeks helped set this up. Sit back and swing at strikes and not try to force the situation. Chasing Bernie really helped me."

Vaughn, who has had differences with management, has focused on the present while declaring his intention to seek free agent offers after the season.

"We have games we have to win," he said. "That's really what my concern is."

Cubs and Braves are prepared for battle in upcoming playoffs

ATLANTA (AP) — Four months ago, John Smoltz trudged off the mound at Turner Field, his elbow aching, his future uncertain after lasting only two innings against the Chicago Cubs.

Today, Smoltz will be on that same mound for the Atlanta Braves, facing that same Cubs team in Game 1 of the NL division series. His elbow feels rejuvenated. His doubts have thoroughly vanished.

"This is the best season I've ever had," said Smoltz, who led the majors in winning percentage (17-3). "This far and away blows away my Cy Young year (in 1996).

Smoltz, who will face Chicago's Mark Clark (9-14) in the opening game, underwent elbow surgery in December and started the season on the disabled list. He made it through seven starts before going against Kerry Wood and the Cubs on May 23.

In two innings, Smoltz surrendered six hits and two runs. He knew before he got to the dugout that he would have to go back on the DL.

"It was such a struggle mentally that I started thinking about whether I wanted to continue this, how many years I wanted to play," Smoltz said. "I've never had those doubts before."

When Smoltz returned from the DL, he abandoned his split-finger fastball because of the pressure it puts on the elbow. The pitcher who once tried to blow every hitter away now throws 25 to 30 change-ups a game.

"I have more and more confidence with my change-up each game," he said. "I think it's a weapon now rather than a show pitch."

The Braves could have used 20-game winner Tom Glavine or ERA champion Greg Maddux in Game 1. Instead, they chose one of the best clutch pitchers in baseball history.

Smoltz has a 10-3 record and 2.35 ERA in 20 starts, tying him with Dave Stewart and Whitey Ford for the most wins in postseason play.

"I'm not afraid to fail," Smoltz said. "At this time of year, I want the ball, I want to pitch ... I think a lot of guys who have great years are afraid they'll not be at their best when they need to be at their best."

The Cubs, who had to beat San Francisco 5-3 in a one-game playoff Monday night to earn the wild-card, don't appear to be at their best.

Their pitching plans were jumbled by the stretch run, forcing manager Jim Riggleman to go with Clark in the opener rather than 15-game winner Steve Trachsel, who started Monday against the Giants, or 19-game winner Kevin Tapani, who worked one inning in relief.

"I feel more confident catching those guys in that situation," Braves first baseman Andres Galarraga said. "The last two games, they've used starting pitchers in the bullpen to make sure they got to the playoffs. Those guys are probably a little bit tired."

The Cubs didn't arrive in Atlanta until yesterday afternoon. The Braves, who clinched the East Division Sept. 14, have been at home for nearly a week.

They held meetings and worked out indoors yesterday while a steady rain kept the tarp on the field. The forecast for today is a 50 percent chance of scattered showers.

Atlanta, which won a team-record 106 games, has a huge edge in postseason experience. This is the Braves' seventh straight playoff appearance; Chicago hasn't been this far since 1989.

Still, the gritty Cubs have overcome numerous obstacles to make the playoffs. And they had more success against the Braves than any other NL team, winning six of nine games.

"This club won't back down — from anyone," said Chicago shortstop Jeff Blauser, who played with the Braves from 1987-97. "Obviously, we'll be the underdogs, and that's not a bad thing."

The wild card for the wild-card Cubs is Wood (13-6), the only Chicago starter with an ERA below 4.00. The 21-year-old left the rotation on Aug. 31 because of a strained ligament in his pitching elbow, and it's not known if he'll be able to pitch against the Braves.

The Cubs may not have Wood, but they do have the second-best home run hitter in baseball history. Sammy Sosa and his 66 homers provide an awesome threat in the middle of the order, though Sosa is hitting .091 (3-for-33) with no homers in his career against Smoltz.

"I'm an aggressive pitcher," Smoltz said. "I'm not going to back down from anybody."

Home Runs only up slightly in 1998

NEW YORK (AP) — Despite the record-topping performances of Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa, home runs were up only slightly this year. There were 5,064 home runs in 2,430 major league games this season, an average of 2.08. Even though it was an expansion year, home runs were up only 1.5 percent from the average of 2.05 homers per game in 1997.

Baseball's record average of 2.19 was set in 1996, when 4,962 homers were hit.

The NL batting average dropped one point this year to .262 and the AL remained at .271. The NL ERA rose to 4.23 from 4.20 and the AL ERA rose from 4.56 to 4.65.

Attendance averaged 29,376, a 3.8 percent rise from last year's average of 28,228 and 16.3 percent above the 1995 average of 25,260. Still, attendance was 7 percent below the pre-strike average of 31,612 in 1994.

Cubs and Giants help to give baseball a big boost

NEW YORK (AP) — Baseball's ratings may lag behind the NFL, but they can still take a bite out of football's audience.

ESPN's coverage of the one-game wild-card playoff between the Chicago Cubs and San Francisco Giants on Monday night was the most watched baseball game in cable TV history.

The game was watched in 6.1 million homes on ESPN and 1.4 million additional homes on over-the-air networks in Chicago and San Francisco. ESPN got an 8.1 rating, second highest to its 9.5 on Sept. 7 for Mark McGwire's 61st homer.

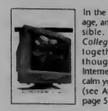
ESPN's rating took a chunk out of Disney partner ABC's "Monday Night Football" rating. The Detroit-Tampa Bay game rated an 11.1 (about 11 million homes), which initial estimates show as the lowest rated game since 1986.

That year, Game 7 of the World Series between the New York Mets and Boston Red Sox went head-to-head with a Washington Redskins-New York Giants football game. The football game got an 8.8 rating, an all-time low.

ABC spokesman Mark Mandel acknowledged that baseball took away part of ABC's audience but said the numbers proved that football is "the king of sports television."

"Here you had one of the all-time great playoff games up against a 'Monday Night Football' game that on paper was not compelling. Yet football still trounced baseball in the rating," he said.

Through four weeks, ABC's football ratings are down 15 percent. Sunday afternoon's exciting finish to the baseball season also hurt NFL ratings. ESPN2 was watched in an average of 900,000 homes Sunday. Local baseball ratings also picked up, leaving CBS and Fox down 10 percent for football ratings.



ESPN's Sunday night football ratings are down 21 percent.

Iraqi foreign minister denounces U.N. moves

UNITED NATIONS — Iraq's foreign minister yesterday compared the effects of eight years of U.N. sanctions against his country to genocide and denounced any nation that insists on retaining them.

Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahaf didn't name the United States in his speech to the U.N. General Assembly, but he clearly was blaming Washington for the United Nations' failure to lift the sanctions.

He harshly criticized the U.N. Special Commission that is carrying out weapons inspections in Iraq and said the commission worked on behalf of one "arrogant, powerful state" to keep the sanctions in place.

That undue influence forced Iraq to stop cooperating with inspectors last month, he said.

"The situation must be strongly denounced basically for those who insist on continuing to inflict on the people of Iraq this destructive blockade, a blockade parallel in its tragic consequences to the internationally proscribed acts of genocide," he said.

Surgical procedure could benefit women

BOSTON (AP) — A new procedure may allow surgeons to reduce dramatically the number of lymph nodes they remove during breast cancer surgery, sparing women some of the pain and possible complications.

During operations to remove breast cancer, doctors also routinely take out the lymph nodes around the armpit in case the cancer has spread to these glands.

Removing the nodes may improve the chances of survival. The presence of cancer there also tells doctors how aggressively to use cancer drugs.

Just as doctors have learned that they can often safely remove just the lump rather than the whole cancerous breast, they are now experimenting with the idea that not all the lymph nodes need to come out, either.

In a study in today's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine, doctors from the University of Vermont provided encouraging evidence that a far less drastic procedure may work. The procedure involves injecting radioactive material around the tumor and then removing only the nodes that eventually absorb it.

Questions remain 1 year after UM student's death

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

Controversy marked the first anniversary of the death of Adam Prentice, the 21-year-old University of Massachusetts junior who died a year ago last Sunday from massive bleeding, as a result of injuries incurred from falling through the glass of a Morrill greenhouse.

Questions remain about Prentice's death, especially those asked by Barbara Prentice, his mother, who feels certain that her son died as a result of foul play.

Among the questions being raised:

- Why did police order the scene to be cleaned within 90 minutes of their arrival? And did they conduct an adequate investigation of the scene?
- Did Adam Prentice receive proper medical attention? And was he treated as a criminal or a victim?
- Are police deliberately withholding information in order to cover up mishandling of the investigation?
- Was Prentice's death alcohol-related?

In an article that ran in The Middlesex News last Sunday, investigative journalist Linda Rosencrance attempted to answer some of these questions and, in doing so, introduced inconsistencies and conflicts in official police reports that Barbara Prentice feels may have contributed to her son's death.

"The police never did a real investigation," said Prentice in the article. "They didn't test the blood in the greenhouse to see if it was his. They didn't test the glass that impaled him to see if it came from the greenhouse. They didn't test his clothes to see if they contained pieces of glass."

According to UMass Chief of Police John Luippold, the investigation into the circumstances of Prentice's death remains "open and potentially criminal." As a result, he said, information which could potentially "chill the investigation" is being withheld from the public.

Adam Prentice

Police are still trying to determine what happened in the last hour before Prentice was discovered by UMass police, bleeding on the ground outside of the greenhouse.

Prentice was last seen at a party in Puffton Village late Friday night, Sept. 26, 1997. Sometime between midnight and 12:30 a.m., Prentice decided to walk by himself to his dorm room in Field Residence Hall in Orchard Hill.

"[Police] responded to an intrusion alarm at Morrill greenhouse at approximately 1:30 a.m. An officer [David Booth] arrived at the scene and found Adam outside the greenhouse adjacent to Morrill. The officer recognized that he was injured and called for an ambulance... clearly Adam had some serious injuries and we treated it as a medical emergency," Luippold said, relaying information from police reports.

"Officers arriving at the scene assisted with first aid... Adam was trying to get up and officers were trying to get him to lay back down in recognizing he needed to be treated for his injuries... Amherst Fire Department's ambulance arrived shortly thereafter," he continued.

Students cast votes in SGA elections

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Results of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) Senate and Area Government elections were tallied last night by the Election Commission.

The election capured at least 5 percent of student body's vote, therefore according to the SGA constitution, the results are valid. Although the official elections report has yet to be completed, most of the senate and area government positions have been filled by candidates.

Referendum questions that appeared on the ballot were: Should credit card vendors be allowed on campus; and should the University allow the student code of conduct to be applied off campus?

Seth Presser, commissioner of elections, said that about 2/3 of the voters said that the code of conduct should not be applied off campus. The majority, he said, also thought credit card vendors should not be allowed on campus.

"The elections went as expected," said Presser, "There were problems that arose during the elections that were immediately solved."

Presser also said that some races were either close or tied. Ballots for these positions will be recounted, he said, and then senate members will have a chance to make a final vote.

The first senate meeting is being held on Wednesday, Oct. 8.

"Overall, I think the election commission, Student Government Association leadership, and student body did a great job," Presser said.

SGA members had hoped that this year's election would not be a repeat of last year's senate elections, which were nullified, and not redone until nearly a month later. To gain student interest in the elections, the SGA added controversial referendum questions to the ballots, set up a table at the RA Resource Fair, handed out flyers in front of the voting locations, and postered campus.

Students who are still interested in getting involved with Student Government should contact the SGA office at 545-0341.

In Northeast a total of five senators were elected, in Sylvan area there are also five, and Southwest elected 13. Orchard Hill residents voted for 6 senators, Central has 6, and for Commuter area government 5 senators were chosen.

Experts say U.S. economy will soar, continuing recent healthy rebound

By Sally Jacobsen
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A key gauge of future economic activity held steady in August in a sign the nation's economy remains healthy and should continue expanding through early next year.

The Conference Board, a private research group, reported today that its Index of Leading Economic Indicators was unchanged last month. It had retreated 0.5 percent in July after two months of declines.

The index, which stood at 105.5, was in line with economists' expectations.

Michael Boldin, a Conference Board economist, said the index held steady in August despite a sharp decline in one of its components-stock prices.

"The overall economy remains healthy," he said in a statement, adding that a majority of the other nine economic measures making up the index were in positive territory.

"The leading indicators point to a continuation of the expanslon through at least early 1999," said the statement. On Wall Street, stocks skidded today, sending the Dow industrials sinking below 8,000. In end-of-quarter selling by traders worried that corporate profits would not get enough of a lift from the Fed's small rate cut.

The Dow Jones industrial average, which fell 28.32 points on Tuesday following the Fed's decision, plunged an additional 237.90, or by 2.9 percent, to close at 7,842.62, according to preliminary figures.

In the flight out of stocks, bonds soared, driving down yields on 30-year Treasury issues below 5 percent for the first time since the government began regular sales of such securities in 1977. The Conference Board statement said an accompanying index signaled that the economy will expand at an annual pace of 2.5 percent to 3.0 percent in the July-September quarter.

Chase Manhattan Bank, one of the nation's largest banks, today cut its prime rate to 8.25 percent from 8.5 percent. Two others, Bank of America and First Chicago NBD, followed suit. Norwest in Minneapolis had lowered its prime after the Fed's move.

Other banks did not immediately cut their prime rates, which serve as a benchmark for many business and consumer loans, including home equity lines and credit-card balances.

The Conference Board reported that five of the 10 indicators making up the leading index rose in August. The most significant advances were in money supply, initial claims for jobless benefits and manufacturers' new orders for non-defense capital goods. The fall in stock prices was the biggest negative contrihutor to the index.

The index slipped 0.1 percent in May and 0.2 percent in June, which were the first back-to-back drops since a string of five declines in January-May 1995. The declines were driven partly by the United Auto Workers' lengthy strikes against General Motors. The board had initially reported the July increase at 0.4 percent. It was revised to 0.5 percent in today's report.

The leading Index is designed to forecast economic activity six to nine months in advance.

paring the benchmark federal funds rate on overnight loans between banks by a quarter of a percentage point, from 5.5 percent to 5.25 percent. The central bank left unmouched its symbolically important discount rate, which the Fed charges on its own loans to banks. It remains at 5 percent.

$40 mil. spent by Starr so far

By Karen Gullo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The cost of the independent counsel's investigations of President Clinton's Whitewater dealings, his affair with Monica Lewinsky and other controversies has topped $40 million.

A government audit report released yesterday showed that Kenneth Starr spent $5.9 million during the six-month period ending March 31, the latest figures available. That brings Starr's expenses to nearly $33.5 million since he took over the investigation in 1994, according to General Accounting Office audits.

Starr's predecessor on Whitewater, Robert Fiske, spent $6 million, making the cost of investigating the Clinton administration almost $40 million — a number that will climb significantly when updated with the past six months' activity. Starr has estimated that he spent at least $4.4 million on the Lewinsky investigation alone over the last eight months. An exact figure won't be available until next spring.

The most expensive independent counsel probe to date was Lawrence Walsh's $48.5 million, six-year investigation of the Reagan administration's Iran-Contra dealings.

Starr was originally hired to investigate Clinton's Whitewater land deals. In 1996, his inquiry was expanded to include the White House travel office firings and the controversy over the White House's gathering of some Republicans' FBI files.

In January, Starr's investigation was expanded again to include the president's affair with Lewinsky and an alleged cover-up. Starr turned over a report to Congress on that aspect of his investigation on Sept. 11, alleging perjury and obstruction of justice.

Starr has said he is nearing completion of the Whitewater probe. The biggest expense has been staff. In addition to 57 regular employees of the independent counsel's office, there are FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents detailed to the investigation. The prosecutor also hires private investigators and other specialists to assist with the work.

During Starr's investigation, more than $24 million has been spent on people-related costs, including $9 million for salaries and benefits for employees of the independent counsel's office, $13 million for FBI, IRS and Justice Department employees detailed to Starr and $2.4 million for hiring outside investigators and other specialists, according to GAO reports.

Travel expenses for Starr, his deputies and agents and witnesses totaled $4.7 million since 1994, audits showed.

Meanwhile, five other independent counsels spent just over $5 million for the six-month period ending March 31, GAO reported: Donald C. Smaltz, independent counsel investigating former Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy, spent $2.6 million. Espy is charged with accepting $35,000 in sports tickets, travel and lodging from Arkansas-based Tyson Foods Inc. and other companies regulated by the Agriculture Department.

• Independent Counsel David M. Barrett's probe of allegations that Henry Cisneros, the former secretary of Housing and Urban Development, lied to the FBI about payments to a former mistress cost $1.8 million during the six-month period.

U.N. could take action in Albania

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — Backed by the United States, Britain yesterday called an emergency meeting of the Security Council to denounce the latest massacre of ethnic Albanians in Kosovo. NATO proceeded with final preparations for airstrikes against Serb forces.

"This was not an act of war, it was plain cold murder," British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said at a news conference at the Labor Party's annual conference in Blackpool, northwest England.

He said the meeting would request an urgent report on Kosovo from U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan. Britain takes over the Security Council presidency on today, which gives it the authority to put matters on the agenda.

Informal consultations on Kosovo were scheduled for this afternoon.

Cook warned that NATO airstrikes could follow Annan's report, which is a regular 30-day update that was expected late this week or early next week.

Prentice was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton and was later transported to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield where he was pronounced dead shortly after 4 a.m.

In The Middlesex News article, Rosenerance says that police arrested Prentice at the scene for malicious destruction of property; Luippold, however, denies that Prentice was placed under arrest.

The question of whether or not alcohol played a role in Prentice's death has been posed. Prentice's blood alcohol content was determined to be 0.12 — what Rosenerance estimates in her article to be the equivalent of Prentice having "approximately five to six drinks in the previous hour" — and Luippold has stated that "Adam had consumed a significant amount of alcohol that evening."

Whether or not alcohol was a factor in his death, however, is difficult to determine without an eyewitness to explain what happened in the last hour before Prentice was found with a fatal injury.

Barbara Prentice stated in the article that she believes the UMass police "never investigated anything."

"Although they issued a statement the next morning asking for any information, they also stated they believed Adam was alone. But I don't believe he was alone. I think he was murdered," she said.

Police surmised that Prentice was alone inside the greenhouse from physical evidence, Luippold said. Two holes in the glass of the greenhouses were consistent with Prentice's entry and exit, "one with glass going in and one with glass going out." Also, blood trails inside of the greenhouse suggested Prentice's path in trying to find his way out.

"After doing a building search and taking photographs of the scene," Luippold said, "we called in the individuals responsible for the greenhouses to come and take care of the two windows that had been broken and then contacted Environmental Health and Safety to clean up [the blood]," Luippold said, emphasizing that it is standard procedure to immediately clean up a "biohazard" — in this case, blood.

Anyone with any information regarding Prentice's death is urged to contact the UMass police department at (413) 545- 2121 or the district attorney's office at (413) 586-9225.

Smoking ban takes effect

By Bill Porter
Associated Press

BOSTON — No butts about it, it just got tougher to find a place to have a smoke in Boston.

About 1,400 city restaurants went smoke-free yesterday to comply with a new ordinance that requires them to physically separate smoking sections from non-smoking areas.

"Personally I think it's wrong. This is America and it's supposed to be about freedom of choice," said Jay Shores, a smoker at Il Trattoria Il Panino's bar yesterday.

That's one place where he can still light up, since the law doesn't affect restaurant bar areas behind partitions or at least six feet from eating areas.

The law also exempts private clubs and bars in general, including those that serve snacks.

About 200 restaurants will only allow smoking at their bar areas.

"Smoke and food don't mix," said Jacquie Beichick of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., a non-smoker who sat a good two or three barstools away from her puffing husband in Vado Pazzo's bar in the city's North End on Tuesday night, the last night smokers could light up after dinner without breaking the new rules.

Joey Wilkinson of Canton was taking advantage, enjoying the last cigarette he might ever have there.

When Vado Pazzo was built two years ago, about $12,000 worth of smoke-eating ventilators were installed over the bar. Useless now, and manager Kelly Shaughnessy said the place would go smoke-free rather than invest in building a partition.

Butt in hand, Wilkinson said the city would better serve its people by focusing on other problems.

"The last time I looked, smoking was not illegal," he said. "Less than half a mile from here, you have youths smoking plastic pipes and then turning around and shooting their friends."

But not everybody was fuming.

Walter A. Fiore of Leominster called the new ban the best thing Boston Mayor Tom Menino has ever done.

And Bill Hussey, a non-smoker at The Times restaurant yesterday afternoon, was in favor as well.

"I think it's a good law. If establishments have a nonsmoking section and a smoking one that's good. You should have a choice on anything, not just smoking," Hussey said.

expenses, benefits and clothing. Even more, employees represent Oscar Mayer Foods and become a recognized spokesperson through involvement at local schools, hospitals and parades.

"It's a great stepping stone in for any career," Melville said. "You're a 21-year-old working at the fifth largest company in the world (Fortune 500), and you have as much, if not more, responsibility than any other person in the company."

Co-hotdogger Amy Sticco felt that the job assists students in finding professional careers.

"People see it on the resume and say, 'Gee, I need to meet this person: they drove a wienermobile,'" she said.

As an Oscar Mayer hotdogger, an individual would tour the nation looking to find children to be in Oscar Mayer television commercials. Hotdoggers also get to make special guest appearances on shows like "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno," MTV, and "The Oprah Winfrey Show."

Although students might relish the special appearance of the famous Oscar Mayer Wienermobile, they won't be able to taste any of the company's products.

"We don't have hot dogs, buns, ketchup or relish," Melville said.

State utilities lobby for Question 4

By Martin Finucane
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state's utilities are fighting tooth and nail to preserve the new electric deregulation law that went into effect in March.

More than $3.6 million has been contributed to a campaign in support of the electric deregulation law, with Boston Edison and Massachusetts Electric each contributing about $1.3 million.

"We're doing it because the law is already in place and because of the benefits to our consumers," said Boston Edison spokesman Mike Monahan.

Activists battling the electric deregulation law, which went into effect earlier this year, claim the law was too kind to the utilities and didn't win enough savings for consumers.

The activists filed a sufficient number of signatures to get Question 4 on the ballot in the Nov. 3 election, which will allow people to vote "Yes" or "No" on the law.

The activists appear likely to be far outspent by the opposing forces, according to filings at the state Office of Campaign and Political Finance.

From March to September, the Campaign for Fair Electric Rates spent about $125,000 and it ended the period with about $30,000 on hand.

"We absolutely think that this ruised an opportunity to provide more savings and better choices for consumers," said Rob Sargent, a spokesman for the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, one of the groups opposing the law.

"I think the same special interests that rammed this thing through the Legislature are going to dominate the airwaves trying to convince people this utility-sponsored deregulation law is a good deal for consumers," he said.

But Monahan pointed out that under the deregulation law, people are guaranteed at least a 15 percent savings on their electric bills by September 1999.

Monahan also said Boston Edison, for example, has sold its power plants to a generating company that is committing more than $1 billion to the state's economy through the construction of new high-tech, environmentally safer power plants.

"With the savings and the infusion of these billions of dollars into the Massachusetts economy, we just don't see this thing being stopped. It's worth the investment," he said.

By mid-September, the utilities and other businesses fighting to protect the deregulation law had spent about $2.3 million and had about $1.3 million left in the bank.

Ads bought by the campaign are becoming familiar features on the airwaves. They include low-key appeals from an MIT professor and an environmental attorney for people to vote "Yes" on the law. The electric deregulation law was designed to usher the electric industry out of the era of regulated monopoly and allow companies to compete to sell power.

Ultimately, power providers are expected to compete for customers much as long-distance providers now compete for people's business. The theory is that competition will drive down electric prices.

A guaranteed savings of 15 percent was included for those who might be leery of jumping into the marketplace.

The Campaign for Fair Electric Rates was spearheaded by environmental activist and businessman John O'Connor, but O'Connor was sidetracked this fall when he tossed his hat into the Democratic race for the Eighth Congressional District, which was won by Somerville Mayor Michael Capuano.

Other major contributors included: Western Mass. Electric, $119,000; Com/Energy, $159,000; Eastern Utilities, $369,600; and U.S. Generating, a power generation company, $175,000.

Shake the foundation

What a shambled state of affairs. We aimlessly waddle through each day attempting to look important and doing tasks to reinforce this feeble-minded theory. And now I sit, falling perfectly into the grand scheme of things, almost allowing myself to be fooled into having pride and feeling important.

The problem is one recurring thought: I pay $70 per class, per session, to sit in an overcrowded lecture hall, with a professor lecturing directly from a book I paid $65 for, while my bodily fluids are sucked from my body due to the failure of a century-old air conditioner. The system sucks and I am merely a reluctant pawn who opts to subscribe to a philosophy of hard-core cynicism.

"He mindlessly reads in a monotone to droopy- eyed students who are paying $70 to sit there and be bored."

Joe Grotto

I can deal with the heat. All my life I have dealt with lethal Chicago summers that can kill landscapers and the elderly. I can deal with the overpopulation in lecture halls. Chicago's walker/driver traffic has desensitized me to this. I don't have to deal with tuition because I'm lucky enough to have parents who are willing to finance my education.

So what do I have to complain about, then? If this isn't the cliched article complaining about ever-rising tuition, then what is it about? It's about something much more than money and discomfort. It's about how professors and TAs don't seem to care much about doing their jobs.

I remember the first time I had an open discussion about this with an instructor. He began by saying that as long as he showed up by a certain time every morning and didn't leave until a certain time every afternoon he would barely have to teach, but would only need to "assign work." He went on to say that if he decided to only "assign work" and not actually teach, then, when his contract was up, he would not only be re-hired but would get a raise.

This is the miracle known as tenure. I asked him why he went through all the extra trouble of actually teaching his students and his reply was that he had pride in his job.

It all made sense. So, now I consider my courses this year and last and realize that very few professors of mine have had enough pride to teach and teach well. I consider one professor who simply recites outlines from the back of the chapters as his "lectures."

He mindlessly reads in a monotone to a herd of droopy- eyed students who just don't seem to be that excited about learning. And these same students are paying $70 to sit there and be bored. And this same professor, and countless others, thanks to the strength of the teacher's union, will never be fired, and will probably get a raise in a couple of years.

I realize that it is hard to motivate students into being enthused about learning, but it is possible. I know this because, like most students, I suffer from pre-school-year jitters. I get my schedule of classes and get all my new supplies, and even a 64-box of crayons if I'm feeling saucy. I relish the fact that I am enrolled in classes that I picked because I thought they looked interesting. I get excited to learn. Then, within a week or so, of the class starting, I get bored. And I am not a lazy person.

Given the right environment I will do anything to understand material I am required to learn. My Ethics TA from last year can confirm that, or my freshman English TA, or my Brave New World professor. The instructors in these courses were not only enthused themselves, but found ways to enthuse their students. And why? Because they had pride in what they did and they forced the students to share that pride. It wasn't the professor's class, it was a collaborative effort.

These people deserve their pay and then some, these people allowed the students to get at least $70 worth of education. Unfortunately, these people are few and far between. And, even more unfortunately, the majority of students are so used to being denied quality education that they don't care when a professor doesn't do his or her job. They assume that it is the norm and that's just how it is. How's that for being conditioned?

So how do we force dry and somewhat worthless professors to be a little more life-like and enthused? At first I thought the only way to solve this problem would be violence. I figured we could shake the very foundation of this University with 30 or 40 tons of napalm. Reason soon took hold and a much more cost-effective solution sprouted: interaction.

Force the professor to know you on a personal level. Make him your professor and make yourself his student. Mutual respect will be gained and the extra effort will be put into the relationship. I know it's not as fun as the first plan, but I doubt house council would be able to sponsor such a project. In the long run the latter of the two ideas will work, and you'll see the outcome. Trust me.

Joe Grotto is a UMass student.

The oldest profession

So far in my two years and change at this University I feel that I have received a pretty good education.

After a couple of years here and a couple of years of procrastinating I will be prepared to enter the real world. My future is fairly mapped out for me now, but I can't help thinking that I may not be taking the right route to success.

You see, it seems to me that the people who are really revered and admired for their successes are entrepreneurs (or as my economics teaching assistant used to say "enterprenners") who start a business in their parents' basement only to turn it into a billion-dollar business.

Having sat through many of the same general education classes as all of you I have learned plenty of stuff and expanded my mind quite a bit.

However when I get out into the real world I don't think that it is going to matter whether or not I know the difference between Rococo and Baroque art. I highly doubt that on any job applications it is going to ask, "Could you explain how vertical and horizontal motion affect each other?" or "Could you briefly summarize Descartes' meditations?"

"Now, I don't mean prostituting myself. I mean prostituting others, women and men."

Dan Viens

I'm not saying that I minded learning these things nor do I want to offend everyone in the art, physics and philosophy departments. All I am trying to say is that learning all of this stuff is not going to give me the edge I need to be successful in the real world.

Going through the motions at a school like this or any school can definitely be a good time, but a much more effective way to learn about the real world is by taking a chance and starting your own business.

With this thought in mind I set out to think of a business venture that was not only practical, but also had the potential to make me a very rich man.

I am serious about this. I was looking for something that would make the world a better place and people would admire me for doing. Therefore the natural choice was prostitution.

Now, I don't mean prostituting myself. I mean prostituting others, women and men. I'm not sexist; I just want happy customers. After what seemed like minutes of grueling thought, I believe that I have come up with the blue prints for a brothel that tiptoes quietly around the boundaries of the law. The first step is finding some hookers.

My next task would be to purchase a hotel somewhere. I wouldn't want anything that was really nice like the Sheraton nor would I want some trashy place where you had to be packing heat to feel safe. I would just try to find some mid-grade hotel, something in the three-star range.

At this three-star hotel that would normally charge $40-50 a night I would charge between $500-1000 for the room. Anything else that may happen in the place of business would be none of my business (literally). The rooms would be nothing special. They would have one or two beds, a TV, basic cable, a couple other odds and ends and, of course, a bible.

The following is what a typical night in my hotel would be like. The guest would check in just like at any other hotel and then they would be shown to their room. Once in their room they would take a nap, watch some television or maybe order some room service.

Next, a woman or man, depending on the guest, would walk into the room. The visitor would then say, "Oh. I'm sorry — I must have walked into the wrong room."

At this revelation the guest would say, "That's all right. Why don't we get to know each other?" The visitor would then reply," Well how exactly would you like to know me?" Then what would happen is... Well you can imagine that part for yourself.

So you see, the customer is paying me an obscene amount of money for a highly average room and only that. Anything that might happen to them coincidentally while they're in my hotel is gravy for them and again, is none of my business.

There are a couple of loose ends that I will tie up for you right now. Of course, if you can figure out that two and two is four then you have deduced that the visitors are actually planned and they are on my payroll.

The way I will get around this is by having the "visitors" clean one room a week and by paying them legally as maids. This would of course be on top of the money which I paid them under the table for their other services.

Another thing that I would do so that nobody would find me out is I would make one of the rooms immaculate, fit for a king and queen. It would have chairs made of ivory, faucets of gold, and tables with elephant's feet for legs.

In case the tabloids or the police started snooping around and wondering why one night in my hotel was so expensive, I would just say, "My guests are paying rock bottom prices to stay in rooms like this one." Then I would show them the decoy. Pretty smart huh?

It is a shame that I should have to come up with such an elaborate plan just to put a few hookers to work. It's ashamed that those in power have decided to outlaw the one profession where these people's true talents lie.

Just imagine if being a chef or an artist were illegal. Then people around the world would be frustrated because they could not put their talents to use without being arrested. This is the plight of the hooker.

Also you have to feel bad for the customer. I mean when you're hungry, if you want food you can get it and when you're bored and you want to go to a movie, you can go. When someone wants sex and they can't get it on their own, why can't they get a hooker? When you really think about it, a hooker is only an elaborate kissing booth and those are at every county fair.

There it is, my plan to be a filthy rich and highly respected entrepreneur and my opinion on prostitution. I hope that you all like my idea. If you are interested in filling out an application for employment you can reach me at my place.

No experience necessary.

Max and me

As I was laying in bed the other night, my mind began to drift off. I began to see visions of fond childhood moments. Many of the most memorable times involved sports.

All the practices, games, matches and meets were flashing back ever so briefly. I'm sure each one of us has some fond memories attached to these events. My thoughts began to center on my days of Little League baseball and the man who taught me so much about the game and about life.

"As a group of rag-tag, semi-talented kids we always found solace in knowing each kid feared Max just as much as the next."

Brian Lohnes

If one is lucky, a very inspirational person will enter their life sometime and affect its outcome.

Such a person entered my life when I was 11-years-old. As a Little League player in my small town, I was ready for the next ability level, "the majors."

Oh yeah, I was going to be running with the big boys now, except there was one problem. I had the coach from hell, or so I was told.

I spent two years playing baseball under the legendary (in my town anyway) Max Beach. Over those two years I was changed from an immature kid to an adolescent.

To describe Max one must conjure up images of a great Polar Bear. He stood over six-feet tall in stocking feet and weighed the better part of 300 pounds.

To add to his mystique he had one very distinct feature, his hair. He had a mane of freshly fallen snow white hair that pushed and poked its way through the holes of his mesh hat.

All this added to the certain air he had about him, a very scary and intimidating air to an 11-year-old boy.

Every summer Max would return from his winter respite in his land barge, otherwise known as a 1975 Buick Electra, and step forth to the field like a priest to the altar. Max professed baseball like the fiery Puritan ministers of old. "Square up to the ball!" "Run through the bag!" These were two of his all-time favorite points to make. It always seemed to me that Max had an ulterior motive to coaching baseball. It is now very clear to me what that was. He managed to instill in me things like work ethic, respect and most of all drive.

As a group of rag-tag, semi-talented kids we always found solace in knowing each kid feared Max just as much as the next.

Max had a love of the game that few will ever know and he had a funny way of showing it.

"God! Start running and get the piano off your back!" He used fear to motivate all of us. We didn't want to get yelled at so we played above and beyond ourselves.

Even still, many a tear was shed after Max put you through the ringer after taking a called third strike or swinging at a high fastball.

My last year on the team I was 12-years-old and I won the coveted first baseman's job. At first I was elated, but soon I realized that when we were the home team Max was less than 10-feet away. Believe me his tongue was as sharp as ever. His words slashed through me like an ax through a sapling.

We were having a pretty good season to start with, but then the team really came alive in the last half of the season. We used our good luck and got a spot in the playoffs.

We found ourselves in the finals and it was looking really good. This story won't end with a heroic home run or a dramatic play because this day held much more for me.

Max had missed the previous two games due to a bad case of the shingles.

Then at the final game he showed up. He was as pale as his hair and as you can imagine his mood was not too good. The needling from the dugout came fast and furious at everyone, the umps and the players. The game went well and we won. I made the last out a first base (I still have the ball) we had a pig pile on the mound. In the midst of all this I looked over to the dugout and saw Max, crying.

That's when it all hit me. Everything he had ever yelled at me and all the hatred I had inside melted away in a sea of tears. I went over and hugged Max. We both cried.

I had finally realized what he had done and how much I loved him. I never wanted to leave the field that day, but I had to, it was the end of one of life's journeys and the beginning of another.

I saw Max about six months ago. I only had time to mutter the traditional greetings: "Hi," and "How have things been?"

There was still something about Max, even though he had aged a good seven years since I last spent time with him, he still had his commanding authority. Without words Max still demanded respect, and to this day I still regret that our meeting was so short.

I've lost track of Max since then, but I am willing to bet a considerable sum he is somewhere either talking baseball or yelling about it.

The Tangled Web We Weave

Ah, the Internet. There's a world of information out there, just at your fingertips. The Internet is a incorporeal, vague dimension where minds from all over the world can meet, trade information and form new friendships.

And what are you doing with it? Looking at obviously fake naked photos of Alyssa Milano. Come on, people.

News has become instantaneous. Borders have become porous. You can order books or CDs. You can download old Atari games for your PC. You can download music, or soundbites from your favorite TV shows. Because of this, in fact, my computer has Mr. Burns from "The Simpsons" saying, "Hello Smithers, you're quite good at turning me on," every time I start it up.

And people are getting filthy rich out there, coming up with applications that to you and me mean nothing, but to others are a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. New opportunities are springing up everyday. Just ask Don Dupree, who has the inescapable infomercial of the moment, wherein he explains to Internet goddess Cindy Margolis that, yes, even you can make money off of the Internet, ya bimbo. Ahh, this plum sure is sweet, isn't it? Isn't it?

What the Internet has done is create a world where people can be heard. Web pages have sprung up left and right. Some have news, some have band info, some have pictures of dogs.

Most of these sites — in fact, a large percentage of these — you will never see. Most are just crap. I mean, I understand Barnes and Noble having a website, but Exxon? How many hits per day do they get? Do they have a "clean- the-oil-slicked-otter" point and click game?

But there are multiple problems that exist today that didn't exist, say, about 10 years ago, when the original version of Prodigy first started making the world a little bit smaller. With the good, we must take the bad.

One of the problems with this brave new world is that it has added to the proliferation of everything that is fake. That person you've been talking to for the last hour and half is not, in fact, a bisexual, blonde hair, blue-eyed, tanned 24- year-old stripper from Iowa. Surprising, but true.

It's a man, baby. In fact, it's probably your uncle, sitting in his boxers, bathed in electronic light, typing "What are you going to do to me next, lover?"

And maybe that fast- acting reporter

Scream–ripoff fails to scare

COURTESY BRUCE MACAULAY

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Correspondent

URBAN LEGEND
Directed by Jamie Blanks
With Alicia Witt, Rebecca Gayheart, Joshua Jackson
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Make no mistake about it. Urban Legend is a Scream wannabe. Then, again what horror movie doesn't want to be Scream? Scream was fun, original and well-crafted. It was immensely popular, had a $100-million box office run, rejuvenated the horror genre, became almost instantaneously entrenched in American pop culture, and spawned a sequel that did the same.

All that said, Urban Legend is not Scream. Sure, it may have borrowed elements from Scream and I Know What You Did Last Summer, but Urban Legend also represents a return to the old-fashioned slash and hack gory style of horror. It has the potential to reach Scream's level, but never quite makes it.

Twenty-five years after a bloody mass murder on its campus, Pendelton University is once again ripe for violence. Natalie, Brenda, Damon and the rest of their small college are preparing for the frat party to celebrate the occasion when a mysterious murder pre-empts the festivities. The investigation into this gruesome murder of a girl leads to the discovery of a deceptive and muddled past for Natalie and the university.

After one of her friends is hung from a tree outside his car, Natalie thinks she knows what is happening. Someone or something is going around killing people according to urban legends — surrealistic myths passed down by teens in every town: like the babysitter who receives menacing calls from inside the house. The problem is that nobody believes her.

One death is pawned off as a practical joke and another as suicide. By the time everyone understands what is happening, everyone is dead. Of course, the irony of the situation is that they all take a class on urban legends, so every one of them is a suspect, including the professor.

Therein lies the strongest part of Urban Legend: it's ability to deceive the audience and keep them guessing throughout the movie. The film delights in leading you down a familiar, dark alley only to reveal that it is a dead end.

The movie presents a bizarre cast of suspects: the professor who happened to survive the mass murder and teaches the urban legends class; the freaky janitor who's been working at the university too long; the overly ambitious, Gail Weathers–wannabe news reporter; the prankster; the partier. Then, it asks you to simply guess, as urban legend quickly becomes reality.

While acting can hardly be expected in the teen horror genre, nobody stands out in Urban Legend. Joshua Jackson probably gives the best performance as an overly hormonal, Pacey–esque prankster. Rebecca Gayheart, a.k.a. Noxema Girl, resumes her prototypical airhead role from Scream 2 as Brenda, Natalie's best friend. Finally, Neve Campbell was far more convincing and much more camera-friendly than Alicia Witt, who plays Natalie, ever could be.

Urban Legend is brilliantly aware of itself, maybe not to the extent of Scream, but it keenly plays off audience perceptions. For instance, Robert Englund, the urban legends professor, brings rich subtext to the movie because of his former role as Freddy Krueger. He, of course, fits right into the audience's mold of a typical serial killer.

Many of the other characters do as well though, so the movie can effectively manipulate its over–knowledgeable, pop-cultured audience. At the same time, the movie can make overt references, like blasting Paula Cole's "I Don't Want to Wait," the theme song from "Dawson's Creek," when Joshua Jackson of "Dawson's" fame turns on his car.

The premise of the movie is definitely original and clever, but admittedly it is executed poorly. There is no sense of imminent danger from any of the characters except Natalie. The film does mildly compensate with a lot of violence and gore that are pretty shocking. Still, it's not the moment of the murder that counts, it's the anticipation. B–

Keri Russell and "Felicity" highlight the fall TV pack

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

After two weeks of new television, there's a picture that can be painted about some of the new series that have debuted. Unfortunately, there's not much good that came out of the new year, but buried deep within the dregs of the new TV season are some high points. So without further ado, here's a review by grade of some of the new shows you should be tuned into.

"Felicity," which debuted this past Tuesday, is the queen of the new shows. Keri Russell starred in what proved to be the absolute best show of the new television season. The WB had to fight hard to get the show and when they won the rights to air it, they did nothing but brag all summer. Not only did they use tons of commercial advertising and other approaches to try to get viewers, but they gave it the station's top-rated time slot that last year belonged to one of the best shows on television, "Dawson's Creek."

It's partly because there's nothing else to watch at 9 p.m. on Tuesday nights that "Felicity" will win its time slot easily. The top competitor last year for "Dawson's Creek" was NBC's "Frasier," which has now moved to take over the time slot that was held by Seinfeld. Now NBC has moved "Just Shoot Me" to "Frasier's" slot, and it will not be able to compete against "Felicity."

The WB certainly has a hit not only because it has hyped this show so much, but because it's excellent. Russell plays a unique character who is the epitome of a fool who listens to her heart even though it gets her in trouble. The basic plot of the show is based on Felicity's decision to follow a high school love to a college in New York even though she has no future plans of her own.

Her foolish decision leaves her in a predicament that she has no idea how to get out of. All together, "Felicity" will no doubt be a hit. The WB needs more programs like this, and fewer programs like "Unhappily Ever After," and they'll make an impact on the ratings. Grade: B+

Another drama series that WB hopes will help gain ratings is "Hyperion Bay" starring "Saved by the Bell's" Mark Paul Gosselaar. Gosselaar plays Dennis, a character who returns to his home town of Hyperion Bay after learning of severe financial troubles after he left.

Though it's got a tough time slot to fill with direct competition from "Ally McBeal," "Monday Night Football," and "The Practice" after football season ends, "Hyperion Bay" could gain a following with a little bit of work, and consequently, is worth a watch. Grade: B

NBC's most anticipated new series, "Jesse," premiered following the lousy season premier of "Friends." "Jesse" stars former "Married With Children" star Christina Applegate, who plays a single mother who lives at home with her overprotective father.

The most important element of the show was when a new neighbor moves in, and Jesse shows some love interest, but cannot acknowledge it out of concern for her son. Jesse also lives with her 20-year-old younger brother who is used as a comedy element because he "gave up speaking over a year ago."

This character is just one of the many problems with Jesse, and other shows NBC tries to make that are rip-offs of "Friends" and "Frasier." Someone should tell the producers of shows like "Just Shoot Me," "Suddenly Susan," and of course "Jesse" that the viewers are sick of these shows, and to come up with a new idea. Grade: D

What seems to be a carbon copy of "Jesse" is NBC's "Encore! Encore!" starring Nathan Lane. However, the series, about a washed-up stage actor, is a little bit better than "Jesse;" still, it has the same old lack of charm.

Nathan Lane does some serious over-acting; an altogether unfunny job that makes this new series worthless to watch. Grade: C-

ABC's hope to revive its lagging ratings by using a different type of comedy in "Sports Night." This is supposed to be a show that does for ESPN's "SportsCenter" what "The Larry Sander's Show" did for late night talk. To put it simply, "Sports Night" doesn't do its job. It's an unfunny and unrealistic look at behind the scenes of a sports news station.

The surprising situations — such as the sports writers realizing that they have a conscience after interviewing a fictional basketball player that has committed a felony — are completely unnecessary, and take away from the comedic grass roots which the show should be acknowledging.

It's sad to say that ESPN's "SportsCenter" is actually funnier than "Sports Night," and I wish we could watch that on campus instead of this drivel. Grade: D+

Finally we come to the great new shows that FOX has to offer: "Holding the Baby," and "That 70's Show," and if the names didn't give it away, they should be entitled "bad" and worse." Which one is which? I lost attention in both too fast to figure the answer out. However, there is some relief in the assurance that these shows will be off the air by the time Thanksgiving roles around. Grades: F

It's easy to see that the new shows on TV this season are not great. However, highlighted by "Felicity," there are some bright spots. The best place to find good entertainment is definitely in all the old shows that you have been watching all along, because there's really nothing new to rave about.

Finally, here's something off the subject that I felt need to be mentioned when I read about it. This week, Oprah Winfrey declined an offer to have Monica Lewinsky on her talk show. Though Winfrey claims that she can relate to Lewinsky's situation and embarrassment, she refused to pay for her to be on the show, when representatives for Lewinsky demanded money.

Oh, way to go Oprah — here was your chance to beat Jerry Springer and you blew it.

Winter gives us his Earth Mass

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The mesmerizing songs of the natural world beautifully complimented by both classical and ethnic music, infused with the soul of jazz are some of the tangible elements of Paul Winter's Missa Gaia/Earth Mass.

Portions of this mass can be heard in the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center this Friday, Oct. 2, at p.m. by the Paul Winter Consort in collaboration with six Pioneer Valley vocal ensembles.

The work, written by Paul Winter in response to a commission from the Cathedral Church of St. John the Divine in New York City, will be performed by the UMass Chamber Choir and Choral, with F. Wayne Abercrombie as director; the Vocal Jazz & African–American Music Ensemble, directed by Horace Clarence Boyer; the Community Music School of Springfield Children's Chorus, directed by Kayla Werling; the Wasonah Regional High School Choir (located in Dalton), directed by Julie Freebern; and the Northfield-Mount Hermon Choirs (located in Northfield), directed by Sheila Hellerman.

"This music has a way of getting under our radar, the inclusion of the actual sounds of animals — whales, eagles, wolves — is so authentic that I think of them as fellow musicians and hear their voices in a different way. This music brings and awareness of our own relationship to earth home in a very special way," said Abercrombie, a professor in the department of music and dance. "When I first heard the music I was moved in a way I couldn't explain and I found that the students were also moved and became very attached to the music."

For the past five years, Abercrombie has taken the Chamber Choir to New York City to perform the Missa Gaia/Earth Mass in the Cathedral Church of St. John the Divine, where the work has been presented annually each St. Francis Day since its premiere in 1981. In fact, students who sang the Earth Mass with the Chamber Choir and have since graduated from the University, came to New York to sing the work with Abercrombie's ensemble.

The music of the Paul Winter Consort has been motivated by Winter's quest to awaken people to the plight of endangered species through the beauty of their sounds. He has performed over 2,000 concerts throughout the Americas, Europe and Asia and has received awards from the United Nations and the U.S. Humane Society. He is a winner of three Grammy awards and nine nominations.

Tickets to the concert are $10 for the general public and $5 for students, elders and children 18 and under. For ticket information call 413-545-2511.

PRINCIPLES OF SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING
RECENTLY, MORNINGSTAR CALLED US CHEAP.
IT'S NOT EVERY DAY YOU GET A COMPLIMENT LIKE THAT.
All financial companies charge operating fees and expenses—some more than others. Of course, the lower the expenses you pay, the better. That way, more of your money goes where it should—towards building a comfortable future.
We make low expenses a top priority.
As the largest retirement system in the world[1]—a nonprofit company focused exclusively on the financial needs of the educational and research communities—our expenses are among the lowest in the insurance and mutual fund industries.[2]
In fact, TIAA-CREF's 0.31% average fund expenses are less than half of the expense charges of comparable funds.[3] It's why Morningstar—one of the nation's leading sources of annuity and mutual fund information—says, "At that level [TIAA-CREF] is cheaper than any other [variable annuity] policy, and is even competitive with the cheapest mutual fund complexes, though it offers far more benefits."[4]
"TIAA-CREF sets the standard in the financial services industry."
Of course, expenses are only one factor to consider when you make an investment decision. Morningstar also noted our commitment to "consumer education, service" and "solid investment performance." Because that can make a difference in the long run, too.
At TIAA-CREF, we believe people would like to spend more in retirement, not on their retirement company. Today, over two million people count on that approach to help them build a comfortable and secure future. So can you. To find out more, call us at 1 800 842-2776. We'd consider it a compliment.

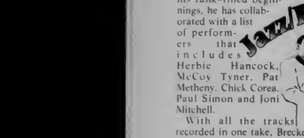
In addition, Lycos will help you build your own web page and then gives you links to different services, which will post them for free. If that's not enough, they also review web sites daily in a number of different categories. If Lycos' actual search engine were better, then it would be far and away the premier site. As it is, I would rate their search tool below Yahoo! and Excite.

• The best of the rest is clearly Altavista (http://www.altavista.net). Although you can't personalize the site, it gives you the basics: ABC news, career, entertainment, finance, health, and travel. Plus, any experienced Net user will tell you that Altavista has far and away the best search tool anywhere. It is very thorough, but, at the same time, it does not include any unrelated or one-word mention links.

• Infoseek (http://www.infoseek.com) just wants to be Yahoo!. It basically mimics Yahoo's appearance, even down to the drab gray colors. The problem? You can't personalize the page, or, if you can, it is impossible to find how to do so. Even if the search tool, which uses that wonderfully confusing percentage system, were comparable to Yahoo!, I would use Yahoo! on principle alone.



• Pathfinder (http://www.pathfinder.com) offers a fresh, modern look for web browser sites, but not much else. If you want to find links to on-line magazines like People or Fortune, then Pathfinder is for you; otherwise, don't bother.

• Snap (http://www.snap.com) usually doesn't get mentioned with the big boys, but warrants consideration in my mind. First, you can personalize it. Second, it proclaims to be much more efficient, concise and dynamic in its searches. I found this to be remarkably true. On a search that was getting 20–plus pages of hits on other sites, Snap managed to reduce it to two. This saves a lot of time, a lot of reading, and reduces the ever–dreaded page jumping.

Brecker's Two Blocks a solid entry

On May 12, Impulse will release Michael Brecker's Two Blocks From The Edge, his first new album since 1996's Grammy award–winning Tales From The Hudson.

Brecker's career began to take off in 1968, when he arrived in New York to play with his brother in the fusion band, Dreams. Since his funk–filled beginnings, he has collaborated with a list of performers that includes Herbie Hancock, McCoy Tyner, Pat Metheny, Chick Corea, Paul Simon and Joni Mitchell.

With all the tracks recorded in one take, Brecker's latest holds a modern, urban sophistication about it, and though at times his playing may sound a bit glossy at times, the CD is overall very solid.

"Madame Toulouse" begins the recording with a jingling tamborine played by Jeff "Tain" Watts that eventually leads to some heavy hitting percussion. "El Nino" sees Brecker and his quintet break into some Latin rhythms and again, the rhythm section of Watts, bassist James Genus, percussionist Don Alias, and pianist Joey Calderazzo lays down a great bottom on top of which Brecker just flows.

"Cat's Cradle" features a mournful Calderazzo piano, while Brecker displays a certain gentility to his playing, capturing the sorrow the song is meant to convey. "The Impaler," featuring the use of a cowbell, is the best track on the CD, because it shows that Brecker wasn't lying when he said that John Coltrane was a definite influence — the sax phrases on this one are insane.

Perhaps the most intriguing thing on the disk is the final cut, "Delta City Blues," which sounds disjointed and quirky, but also raw, like nothing else Brecker plays on this recording.

All the songs on the album do a good job of evolving within themselves, with consistent build–ups and breakdowns in speed, and sound layers constantly being added and subtracted.

Legacy has done jazz lovers everywhere a huge service with the March release of Miles Davis Live At Carnegie Hall, the first time the historic 1961 concert has been released in its entirety.

The double disc covers Davis and his quintet, consisting of tenorman Hank Mobley, pianist Wynton Kelly, bassist Paul Chambers, and drummer Jimmy Cobb, as well as the legendary trumpet–player as a soloist with Gil Evans' orchestra. The recording provides an excellent look into Davis' sound before he broke with the bop purists and moved into more avante–garde territory.

"So What" seems to sneak the set in, but then explodes as Davis exhibits some brash high–octave phrases, met by Cobb with crashing percussion and some wrinkly abstraction coming out of Mobley's tenor. The orchestra comes in at the end, but it is almost unnoticeable because the quintet is so intense.

"Walkin'" breaks in immediately from a blaring trumpet– featured "Teo," only to move faster and faster, with spastic trumpet and tenor, and the brashest, most precise bass solo of all time. The drum breaks are awesome, as Cobb just pounds the skins with wreckless pleasure and searing passion.

"The Meaning Of The Blues/Lament" shows the beauty of having an orchestra play behind Miles Davis, though it may seem like a conflict of interest. The song is solemn, with Davis playing a stirring, grave series of phrases that are very beautiful, and the fact that Evans' orchestra is able to hold back the way it does is testament to its talent.

This Carnegie Hall concert is outstanding for its range of sound, rhythms and arrangements, but it is still only the second best live jazz recording — second only to Coltrane's Live at Birdland. High praise, especially since this album is Miles before he has reached his full potential.

didn't get the facts right when he rushed to file his story a millisecond before his competitors.

And can we really believe every random rumor and conspiracy theory that we run across? Of course not. The way we disseminate and absorb information must be changed. Everything that is digested must be done so with a grain of salt.

This sort of false information trickles down through everything, leading one to question what exactly is the truth. Those pictures of Alyssa Milano? Fakes. In fact, Milano's mother has started a campaign to try and rid the net of these pictures, and has tried to enlist help in her cause.

Privacy must be redefined as the Internet creates a new doorway into our lives. A telephone line becomes an electronic keyhole into our lives, and there are people just lining up to see exactly what you are up to. And people know. Cookies are dropped into our basket each time we pass through a web site. Don't know what I'm talking about? Well, neither do I, technically.

What happens is that these cookies are collected and recorded, and you get advertisements and e–mails based on what your Internet habits are. Wonder why you get ads for sex toys while your cruising? Well, you shouldn't have stopped by that Alyssa Milano all–nude site.

What is worrisome about this is: they know. What should be a secret little predilection becomes a marketing tool, and while there is a way to protect yourself, there are too many ways to get around them. I mean, what do you or I know in the long run?

The Internet is very new, and its explosion has led to various questions on what constitutes libel, slander and harassment. People are left unprepared for the kind of moral questions that arise with something as unique as cyberspace. No one was ready.

As something that exists outside of normal, tangible boundaries, something that has no true national affiliation, the questions about what is exactly right and wrong become vague. Something that is totally legal in Sweden (where everything seems to be legal — those naughty Swedes) may not be here. Hate crime pages originating from Germany have come under fire in this country, but where does the precedent lie? Whose culture takes precedent?

While we may think that everything is calming down, and things are evening out, it's only just begun. Modem speeds increase and soon we'll be getting news before it happens. So why don't you put this paper down, get on the Internet and do something enlightening and productive? Like read the Starr report.

Museum presents food as art

By David Kligman
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Like a huge, five-course Thanksgiving dinner, a museum exhibit dedicated to what we eat is challenging the idea that food fails to satisfy as a subject of artistic expression.

"A Feast for the Eye: Food in Art," is a mouthwatering collection of 250 works, few of them the still lifes that people might expect.

How about boxes of Ritz crackers stacked in a supermarket aisle? Or two starving men in turn-of-the-century France boiling shoe leather in a giant kettle? How about a handbag that looks like a loaf of bread?

All are represented in the exhibit opening Saturday that continues through Dec. 13 at the M.H. de Young Memorial Museum in Golden Gate Park.

Cartoons, photographs, short films, dishware and paintings are just some of the works that illustrate the serious and humorous sides of food as a symbol of wealth and status, as well as a commentary on those left powerless without food.

"I would like people to take away some of the deeper subjects but also to really be able to kick back and say, 'Holy cow! A hat that looks like a head of lettuce,'" curator Melissa Leventon says.

Leventon, a self-described amateur chef, first came up with the idea more than a year ago as a way to showcase the museum's permanent collection.

There's no catalog, but the exhibit was timed to coincide with a cookbook published by the Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco. A recipe for stuffed fillet of sole is displayed opposite Gunter Grass' 1978 surreal etching, "Man in Flounder."

Leventon had hoped to include artwork of actual food but could not because of potential problems with ants, spiders and silverfish at the aging museum.

The pieces are laid out according to the metaphor of a meal, beginning with food and drink, continuing with dining, tableware and subjects for dinner conversation. The final serving is a kind of after-dinner entertainment, an outrageous look at food as art, including a coat made to look like cabbage and a short film showing the effects of sour candy balls on children.

One critic, Jonathon Keats of San Francisco magazine, complained the exhibit misses the mark because it is organized by subject matter.

"While there's nothing wrong with displaying objects in an anthropological context, just as there's nothing wrong with eating a can of soup for lunch, these are not things you do in a fine arts museum," Keats wrote.

Stomachs may growl as visitors gaze at William J. McCloskey's sensuous painting, "Orange in Tissue Paper" or David Gilhooly's cartoonlike "My Daily Bread," which depicts a gargantuan sandwich that looks like something Dagwood would eat.

Then there's Marianne Boers' screen prints of boxes of Ritz crackers in a supermarket and bottles of Perrier water. Leventon said the artwork includes the hidden message that our society has become dependent on mass-produced food and drink.

There also are sobering images — a 1949 photograph of a British family eating in squalor, and an Italian POW's book of recipes meticulously collected from fellow prisoners' memories of their mothers' cooking.

Decorative arts on display include a 19th-century Peruvian silver spice box that has a lock and key because spices were scarce at the time. Leventon said the majority of such pieces were intended for use at dinner tables, something that is lost when it becomes labeled artwork.

"You can look at a silver sauce boat and you can admire the beautiful chasing and molding," she said.

"But you can also understand that this is something that somebody put gravy in and picked up and poured gravy over whatever was on their plate. This was a useful item."

Thompson takes role in suffrage miniseries

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Lea Thompson was trying to explain the struggle for women's rights to her daughter, Madelyn, because the 7-year-old couldn't understand that her great-grandmother hadn't been allowed to vote.

"A Will of Their Own," a two-part television movie on NBC Sunday-Monday, Oct. 18-19, may prove a revelation for young Americans who take women's rights for granted. The four-hour saga traces 100 years of a family in which the women campaign against the traditions of male superiority.

Thompson has the major role as the mother and grandmother who witnesses decades of struggle for women to vote, to take jobs reserved for men, to win equal rights, to express opinions openly.

It is so easy to think that women are almost equal in this country," the actress remarked. "But you go to half of the rest of the world — the Middle East, much of Africa, China — women have few or no rights. When you have two daughters, that's something you have to remember and fight for and appreciate.

"So I was happy to make a story that I hope is entertaining, so that men can also remember what their mothers and grandmothers went through."

"A Will of Their Own" came about, she said, "because NBC wanted to make something to put against baseball." (Game 2 of the World Series is on Fox on Sunday.)

It was a long-standing project from the company of David L. Wolper and son Mark, which has been responsible for such sagas as "Roots" and "The Thorn Birds." The large cast includes Academy Award winners Ellyn Burstyn and Faye Dunaway.

For her portrayal, Thompson borrowed from her mother's life.

"She had a conflict about being a mother and working. She had to work or she'd go crazy. There was that whole political thing in the 1950s that you were supposed to be Donna Reed and be really happy with that. Donna Reed wasn't like that in real life.

"I would watch 'Father Knows Best,' and I'd say, 'You should be like this.' My mother would say, 'No, honey, I have to be me. I need to paint, I need to do a play. I need to be myself.' With five kids and a divorce, she managed to pull it off. It wasn't easy."

Thompson was interviewed in Studio City, where her NBC series "Caroline in the City" is filmed. On the day before the episode's performance, four camera crews were lining up the shots with stand-ins.

After a manicure, while the crew broke for lunch, she conferred with the director about changes she felt were necessary. She expresses herself quietly, but there is no doubt who is in charge.

"I'm a Minnesotan, and I don't like waste and wasted time," she said, sitting down in her office to a hamburger she couldn't eat because her nails were still wet. "So I have a good producer's mind. Sometimes I freak out about time not spent wisely."

Does she have to get tough sometimes?

"Oh, no. We have a nice group of people. Creating enemies is not really my forte. It's hard for me to work under those circumstances. If I think anyone doesn't like me, I get off. I'm like the character of Caroline in that respect."

How close is Caroline to Lea?

"I don't know. Some weeks closer than others. I'd love to show about failure or wanting people to love me. I feel personally the same way as I do as an actor. I'm more vulnerable, and I cry and get into it. Other weeks on a light show, I don't take it on personally."

Sox' Tim Wakefield blames self for loss

CLEVELAND (AP) — Tim Wakefield is never sure where his knuckleball is going. Yesterday, it landed in all the wrong places for Boston's starter.

Two pitches plunked Manny Ramirez. Two others eluded Jason Varitek for passed balls. Too many fell in for hits. After 1 1/3 innings and 10 batters, Wakefield's shortest stint of the year ended.

"I let the team down," he said after the Cleveland Indians tied the AL division series at a game apiece yesterday with a 9-5 win over the Red Sox.

Wakefield was coming off an exceptional regular season — career highs of 17 wins, 33 starts and 216 1-3 innings. In all that time, he never encountered what happened in the top of the first. The ejections of Cleveland manager Mike Hargrove and pitcher Dwight Gooden lengthened the inning, so Wakefield warmed up again. He finally took the mound after a 39-minute top of the first. Did that throw him off?

"I'm not going to say it did," Wakefield said. "I'm not going to use that as an excuse. I just didn't pitch very well." You could tell that the long wait in that first inning really got him out of his rhythm," said Mo Vaughn.

Wakefield began by walking Kenny Lofton, who stole second on a typically slow pitch. He hit Ramirez and followed with consecutive pitches for passed balls.

In the second, Wakefield threw pitches he probably wishes weren't so close to the plate. Travis Fryman singled and Sandy Alomar and Lofton each doubled in a run.

"I wasn't throwing strikes," Wakefield said. "The good pitches that I threw they didn't swing at and were balls. And the balls that I threw for strikes got hit pretty hard."

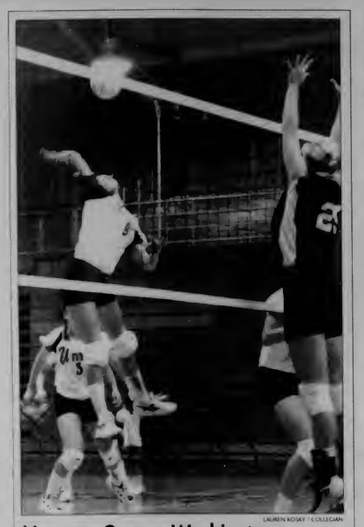
He left the game after Lofton's double and spoke with reliever Dennis Eckersley.

"I told Eck in the dugout, 'I feel like I didn't even pitch,'" he said. That may help Friday, when he could be available out of the bullpen for Game 3 in Boston.

His performance was nothing like his first two playoff appearances, complete-game victories as a Pittsburgh rookie in the 1992 NLCS.

It was similar to his last postseason game when he allowed seven runs and five walks in 5 1/3 innings as Cleveland completed a three-game sweep of Boston in the 1995 division series.

Yesterday, Varitek said, umpire Joe Brinkman had a small strike zone that didn't help Wakefield find a rhythm. And his knuckleball moved inconsistently, leading to the passed balls.



"One will move quite a bit more than another. He wasn't comfortable," Varitek said.

"His ball was moving," Cleveland's Omar Vizquel said. "Maybe we just were too fired up for it to matter."

John Wasdin relieved Wakefield but didn't seem comfortable either. The second batter he faced, Dave Justice, hit a three-run homer on a split-finger fastball.

"It's the pitch I wanted. It just wasn't the location," he said.

Wakefield relies on just one pitch and rarely got it in the right spot.

Last week's opponents for UMass football team will take on the Big Red

ITHACA, N.Y. (AP) — Rest assured of one thing: Cornell coach Pete Mangurian won't be around to greet the University at Buffalo Bulls when they arrive here for Saturday's game, and neither will his team.

The Bulls present enough problems on the field. Mangurian sees no reason to give them a chance to intimidate his team before the game.

"How they look coming off the bus [will be impressive]," Mangurian said on the eve of his first home game as coach of the Big Red (1-1). "These guys can run, they're fast, and they're big."

Try this on for size. Buffalo (2-2) has four offensive linemen that weigh at least 300 pounds — including 6-foot-3, 364-pound freshman Wade Harlan — and 6-foot-2, 300-pound Jason Hayden on defense.

Throw in 6-foot-6, 242-pound quarterback Chad Salisbury, an array of scholarship players on a team that's headed to Division I-A, and you get the big picture.

"We've got our plate full," Mangurian said. "No question about it.

"We're a little out of our neighborhood here, but it is what it is. You don't dwell on it. You just hope you get an opportunity to win."

Cornell rebounded from a season-opening 6-0 loss at Princeton with a 17-9 victory a week ago at Holy Cross. The Bulls are facing their third straight road game and are coming off a 51-27 loss to Massachusetts, a game the Bulls could have won. But four turnovers spoiled a 529-yard performance by Salisbury (375 yards passing) and the offense.

Against the Crusaders, the Big Red rebounded from a 9-0 deficit to win. It was a few players on offense who made the defensive plays of the game.

Deon Harris, who rushed for 100 yards and scored a touchdown, saved a touchdown on the last play of the first half by running Barrett Doxsey out of bounds at the Cornell 2-yard line after he had intercepted a Mike Hood pass.

And 6-foot-5, 227-pound sophomore wideout Joe Splendorio, who plays on special teams, blocked a field-goal attempt late in the third quarter to set up the field goal that put Cornell ahead to stay.

"It was a team win," Mangurian said. "Our defense has done well not giving up points. But our offense has done a great job of not putting them in a situation where they have to defend the short field."

After a 30-year hiatus, Buffalo won 41-24 two years ago at home, getting 10 points in the last two minutes.

But this year's Cornell team is a much different bunch. "We're not a big-play team," Mangurian said. "We play field position, take advantage of an opportunity, and don't give them an opportunity. I know it's going to lead to a lot of close games, but we're best served playing that way. You've got to know your identity and live with it."

Mike Tyson tries to get boxing license

LAS VEGAS (AP) — Mike Tyson's handlers want to clear a major obstacle toward regaining a license for the former heavyweight champion — settlement with two men who accuse Tyson of assault following a traffic accident in Maryland.

The Nevada Athletic Commission will rule on Tyson's effort to return to the ring, and yesterday waited for reports from doctors who examined Tyson at Massachusetts General Hospital last week.

The reports were to have been submitted by Monday. When they weren't, the commission postponed Saturday's licensing hearing. The commission said a date for the new hearing probably won't be determined until today.

The attempt to settle comes after two Nevada boxing commissioners said they want to know what happened in Maryland before they vote on giving Tyson a license.

"Hopefully, this will all be resolved before the hearing," Tyson adviser Jeff Wald said. "We're going to try to deal with it before then."

Tyson refused to answer questions about the matter at his Sept. 19 hearing before the Nevada commission.

But with commissioners now on the record saying they want answers before giving Tyson a new license, the boxer's lawyers have begun negotiations on a settlement.

Richard Hardick, 30, says Tyson kicked him in the groin after Hardick's car rear-ended a Mercedes driven by Tyson's wife, Monica, Aug. 31 in a Maryland suburb. Hardick and Abmielec Saucedo, 62, who said Tyson punched him in the face, have filed criminal complaints. Calls to both men and their lawyers yesterday were not returned, but Tyson's lawyers confirmed they want to settle. Wald declined to discuss the negotiations.

Wald said clearing up this dispute means more to Tyson than just a return of the license he lost for biting Evander Holyfield's ears last year.

Tyson is still on probation from his rape conviction in Indiana and could conceivably be returned to prison if convicted of another crime.

Wald said Tyson would not give up his right to presumed innocence by talking about the incident before the commission.

Ohio State takes No. 1 ranking and two–TD favor into contest against Nittany Lions this weekend

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) — This year, it's Ohio State, not Penn State, with the No. 1 ranking entering Saturday's Big Ten showdown at The Horseshoe.

This year, it's the Nittany Lions with the two-quarterback system, not the Buckeyes.

And this year, there's a good reason the Buckeyes are favored by two touchdowns: Curtis Enis no longer plays for Penn State, and Joe Germaine, David Boston and Dee Miller are still around for Ohio State.

"This is one of the best teams we have played since I've been at Penn State," said Joe Paterno, in his 49th year — 33rd as coach — at Penn State.

Compliments aside, Buckeyes coach John Cooper knows the seventh-ranked Nittany Lions can cause problems.

"They put a tremendous whipping on us last year, and Enis ran for 200 yards in one of the worst defensive games we played and one of the best offensive games they played," Cooper said. "We look forward to them coming here this week."

He should.

Not only is Enis gone, but running back Aaron Harris has yet to recover from knee surgery in '97. Harris' 51-yard TD run late in the third quarter started the Lions' comeback. Cordell Mitchell starts at tailback, but Harris will play.

Also, the Lions (3-0) are going with two quarterbacks — Kevin Thompson and Rashard Casey. The Buckeyes (3-0) have no such concerns. Germaine, who threw for 378 of the Buckeyes' 459 passing yards against Penn State, now has the job all to himself. Boston and Miller, who combined for 299 receiving yards in last year's game, are even more dangerous in '98.

An added dimension is tailback Michael Wiley, fifth in the nation with 166.67 yards per game.

"I think they are better," Penn State linebacker Brandon Short said. "You don't stop their offense. We're not going to stop their offense.

Using your head

After going 1–1 in a couple of games in Colorado, the UMass women's soccer team will try their luck back home against Temple tomorrow. Read the Collegian for a preview.

Patriots will not overlook Saints

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Patriots coach Pete Carroll is trying his best not to take the New Orleans Saints lightly.

Although the Saints, New England's opponent at the Louisiana Superdome on Sunday, have a 3-0 record entering the game, they have yet to face an opponent the caliber of the 2-1 Patriots, believed by many to be legitimate Super Bowl contenders.

But Carroll says the Patriots have a lot to be concerned about.

"They've got all the ingredients for a winning formula, plus they have (coach) Mike Ditka's attitude and his approach to the game, which has been obvious over the years," Carroll said during his press conference yesterday.

He said the factors that concern him the most are the Saints' impressive run defense and their 13 quarterback sacks. The Patriots, still struggling to find a consistent running attack, have become more dependent upon quarterback Drew Bledsoe to move the ball through the air to compensate.

"They are forcing you to throw the football because they are playing so well at the line of scrimmage," Carroll said. "People are turning to the passing game against them. The things that we don't like to go against are what they're doing."

Bledsoe said one way to counter the Saints' pass-rushing tendencies is to have some success running the ball on first down.

"We have to be able to come out and make some plays in the running game, three or four yards on first down," Bledsoe said. "If you can be successful on first down, then you've got a better chance of maintaining some rhythm and maintaining some flow in the game.

"If we put ourselves in long-yardage situations, then they have more chances to come after you," he added. "We haven't been effective enough on first down so far, and that's one thing that has hampered us."

"We constantly have to work on the balance that will make it more difficult on the defense," Carroll said of the need to get the running game in gear. "We can't allow them to just tee off on us with all the different looks you can get with the rushes that they have."

Ditka, who will be coaching in his 200th NFL game on Sunday, has also gotten the most mileage possible out of an underrated running game. The Saints have the fifth-ranked rushing offense in the NFL, led by Lamar Smith's 249 yards on 52 carries and Ray Zellars' 102 yards on 27 carries.

Carroll may have to deal with the Saints' running attack with a change along his defensive line. Starting defensive end Ferric Collons suffered a severely sprained ankle in the Patriots' 27-16 win over Tennessee two Sundays ago, and may not be ready to play in New Orleans.

If Collons can't play, third-year veteran Chris Sullivan will replace him.

Football Hall of Famer Walker honored after unexpected death

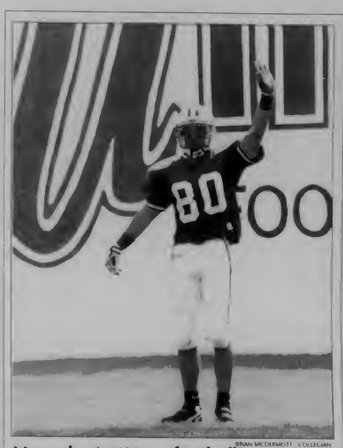
STEAMBOAT SPRINGS, Colo. (AP) — Football Hall of Famer Doak Walker was remembered yesterday as "a man who ran with the big dogs all his life, and yet he was one of us."

Rod Hanna, vice president of marketing for the Steamboat Springs ski area and a close friend, said Walker "liked to do things in a big way," and became a hero in his adopted hometown.

Texas running back Ricky Williams, who won this year's Doak Walker Award, said he "was honored to be mentioned in the same breath as this wonderful man."

"I will be wearing Doak's number on my helmet in honor of him this weekend and am dedicating my season to his memory," Williams said.

Walker died Sunday from complications of paralysis he suffered in a ski accident in January.



Among the estimated 600 people who attended the services at Holy Name Catholic Church were former Detroit Lions teammates Harley Sewell, Joe Schmidt, Yale Lary and Jim Davis. Also attending were Heisman Trophy winner John Huarte, and Pete Elliott, a member of the Pro Football Hall of Fame.

A closed-circuit television system was set up so the overflow crowd could view the service in the church basement or a tent just outside.

Hanna said relatives and friends will scatter Walker's ashes on Long Peak, east of Steamboat Springs, an area where Walker liked to camp.

A Heisman Trophy winner at SMU, Walker played for the Detroit Lions for six seasons during the 1950s, leading them to two NFL championships. He was an All-Pro four times.

Walker was elected to both the NFL and college Hall of Fame. He is survived by his wife, Skeeter Werner Walker; his four children, Laurie, Russell, Chris and Scott, and four grandchildren.

Now that's UMass football!

Wideout Jimmy Moore represents the new influx of talent that has helped the Minutemen go 2–1 this season. This Saturday, they play at Hofstra.

Cunningham has change of heart as Vike

EDEN PRAIRIE, Minn. (AP) — He used to check after every game. Where do I rank? What's my rating? Am I chance for individual honors?

Randall Cunningham admits his 11 seasons with the Philadelphia Eagles were mostly about fulfilling his own goals, about looking good first and worrying about the team later.

That's changed during his two seasons with the Minnesota Vikings. A season in retirement in 1996 and a deepened religious faith helped Cunningham see there are far more important things than how good he looks on paper.

This week, for example, Cunningham was surprised when he was told he was the NFC's top-rated quarterback and had been chosen the conference's offensive player of the week for his role in Sunday's win at Chicago.

"I am appreciative of things like that, because I put my faith in God and I hope people understand all I have is faith," Cunningham said. "Here I was trying to do my own thing in the past. Retirement, that was my thing."

Winning is his thing now.

The Vikings (4-0) have won both games Cunningham started, and he came off the bench to throw the winning touchdown pass three weeks ago at St. Louis when Brad Johnson broke a bone in his lower right leg early in the fourth quarter.

At Chicago, Cunningham threw for 275 yards and four TDs in a 31-28 victory. He has thrown for six TDs with no interceptions, and shares the NFL's top quarterback rating with John Elway at 115.5.

"You go against guys like Brett Favre and Steve Young and all those guys. Man, I'm just an old-timer," Cunningham said.

That's something his teammates frequently remind him, too.

"A lot of us younger guys idolized Randall when we were in junior high and high school," offensive tackle Korey Stringer said. "We're never surprised by anything he does. We expect it from him."

Cunningham will face his biggest test of the season Monday night when the Vikings visit Green Bay in a matchup of unbeaten NFC Central leaders. Minnesota hasn't won at Lambeau Field since the 1992 opener, Dennis Green's first game as coach, and the Packers' 29-game home winning streak is just two short of Miami's NFL record.

There also is a chance Monday could be Cunningham's last game as the starter. The Vikings have their bye week after playing Green Bay, and Johnson, who still wears a walking boot to protect his leg most of the time, could return as soon as the Oct. 18 game against Washington.

But it's also possible that Johnson could miss most or all of October. Although the Vikings clearly miss his consistency and his encyclopedic knowledge of their offense, they also believe they have the best backup in the NFL.

"A lot of teams have backups, and you don't know if they'll perform," center Jeff Christy said.

Major League Baseball sees coaching moves in postseason

MILWAUKEE (AP) — Brewers manager Phil Garner and two of his coaches, Jim Lefebvre and Bill Castro, will be back next season but other members of the coaching staff won't be, the team announced yesterday.

There had been speculation that the team might not bring Garner back for the final year of his contract after another dismal finish in 1998. The Brewers were 74-88, their worst record since 1995, in their seventh season with Garner at the helm.

But general manager Sal Bando said Garner would return for his eighth season, along with Lefebvre, who was brought in as batting coach in mid-August, and Castro, who has been bullpen coach since 1992.

Lefebvre will stay as batting coach but Castro's job title hasn't been set.

Bando said first-base coach Joel Youngblood, third-base coach Dougy Mansolino and pitching coach Don Rowe were not offered contracts for 1999.

Bando's brother Chris Bando, the Brewers' bench coach in 1998, was offered another job in the organization.

Dodgers' Hoffman won't return as manager

LOS ANGELES — The manager of the Los Angeles Dodgers used to have the most stable job in sports. Now, new general manager Kevin Malone is in search of the team's third field boss since June.

Saying he "needed my own guy, a proven winner with experience," Malone announced yesterday that Glenn Hoffman will be a member of the coaching staff, not the manager, of the Dodgers next season.

Malone said he hoped to have a new manager and coaching staff in place by the time baseball's organizational meetings begin at the end of October in Vero Beach, Fla. — site of the team's spring training headquarters.

"I made this decision because I felt like this organization needed to make a change, go in a different direction," said Malone, who was hired by the Dodgers on Sept. 11 to succeed interim GM Tom Lasorda. "I just felt like because of the timing, we needed to have a new manager for 1999.

"I'm not making these changes haphazardly. I'm committed to making the Dodgers the best organization in baseball. I'm committed to winning."

Malone mentioned former Red Sox manager and former Baltimore Oriole, Kevin Kennedy, the job.

When asked about Montreal Expos manager Felipe Alou, believed to be the leading candidate, Malone said he couldn't comment because the Dodgers don't have permission to speak with Alou, who has one year remaining on his contract with the Expos.

"We will see what develops in the next few days," Malone said. "If that situation presents itself, at that point I'll go forward."

Alou, 63, has been the Expos manager since May 22, 1992. Malone was Montreal's general manager in 1994 and 1995. If Alou wants to take the Los Angeles job, it's believed the Expos won't stand in his way.

"There are a few other current major league managers that would be on my list," Malone said, adding that no interviews were scheduled at this time.

Huffman, 40, guided the Dodgers to a 47-41 record after replacing Bill Russell, who was fired along with general manager Fred Claire on June 21.

The Dodgers, who made the playoffs in 1995 and 1996 and were eliminated from contention on the final weekend last year, were never in contention this season, starting with four straight losses and finishing 83-79.

Go! Fight! Win!

As seen at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium last Saturday, the UMass fans can be some of the best in the nation.

URI, Brown compete for Governor's Cup

SOUTH KINGSTOWN, R.I. (AP) — Brown and Rhode Island may be forced to start backup quarterbacks Saturday when the teams meet for the 83rd Governor's Cup, the annual game to determine who can brag about being the state's best.

If the backups start, it would appear Brown has the edge. The Bears (1-1) have a more experienced player in junior Eric Webber, while the Rams would go with freshman Vince Nedimyer.

Neither player has much game experience, but Rhode Island coach Floyd Keith says Webber has the edge in maturity.

"He shaves," said Keith, whose team is 0-3. "My guy just puts milk on his chin."

Would-be starters James Perry of Brown and Rudy Bulgar of URI have been trying to play through injuries since the first game of the season, and both re-injured themselves last weekend.

Perry suffered a right knee injury prior to his teams opener and was feared lost for the season, but he has played in both games, completing 49 of 80 passes for 522 yards.

Bulgar separated his left shoulder early in the Rams first game and has been in and out of the lineup since.

"I can't tell you he's not going to start and I can't say he is," said first-year Brown coach Phil Estes of Perry, a junior, who was an All-Ivy League selection last year. "I never say no when it comes to James Perry."

Keith was less specific about Bulgar's status.

"The trainers use three terms to classify injured players: probable, usable and questionable, said Keith. "Somewhere between P, U and Q is where Rudy is."

The series, in which Brown holds a commanding 62-18-2 lead, has featured high-scoring, pass-happy games in recent years, including last years 23-15 Brown victory.

"It's always been exciting," said Keith, in his sixth year at URI. "Always something unexpected happens. There's always a thrill, a tense moment. I don't expect this one to be any different."

Keith said the Bears play inspired football against his team. "How they play against URI is different than I see them play on tape," said Keith, who has lost to the Bears three of the last four times he has faced them.

Estes, whose team lost to Yale, 30-28, and beat Lafayette, 23-21, said Rhode Island is the most talented team on Brown's schedule, and is a better team than its 0-3 record indicates.

"With a little bit of luck they could be 3-0 instead of 0-3," he said.

The Rams, who play in the Atlantic 10 Conference, lost 21-13 to William & Mary, but had a chance to tie the game in the closing minutes.

They lost 20-17 in overtime to Richmond, and 24-17 at Northeastern last week after leading 17-7.

"I know were going to win our share of games," said Keith. "Sometime we're going to explode. I hope it's Saturday." "We're fighting for respect and for the Governor's Cup," said Estes. "It's been in our office and we don't want it to leave."

The game is at noon Saturday in South Kingstown.

while the Vikings have a run game in Robert Smith. Oh yeah, and three incredible wide receivers. The pick of the week is the Vikes and seven.

You want some more reasons to pick the Pats this weekend against the Saints? Fine. Drew Bledsoe, Danny Wuerfell. Draw your own conclusions. Take the Pats minus 6 1/2.

The Miami Dolphins (3-0) head to the Meadowlands with a perfect record to meet the Jets (1-2). They'll also leave the Meadowlands with a perfect record.

Why? Simple. Because Parcells insists to start Glen Foley (0-2 as a starter) instead of Vinny Testaverde (1-0 as a starter and four touchdown passes). This is the easiest game of the week. Take Miami and the 2 1/2.

Finally, my favorite game of the week. The game that pits Peyton Manning and the Colts (0-4) against Ryan Leaf and the Chargers (2-2). If you all remember, I made a prediction last season before the draft, that Leaf would be the better pro quarterback. Thus far, he has been. Leaf has five fewer interceptions and two more really important statistics — that is, he has two more wins then Manning (and soon to be three). Take the Chargers and one point to smoke the Colts. Paul Teves is a Collegian columnist.

Changes overtake NHL on brink of new season

By Ken Rappoport
Associated Press

In an era of change in the NHL, the Detroit Red Wings are striving for consistency.

Not since the New York Islanders' four championships from 1980-83 has a team won the Stanley Cup as many as three straight times. The Red Wings have a chance to do just that as the NHL's 82nd season opens Oct. 9 with a new team, a new six-division setup and new rules intended to increase scoring.

The changes don't stop there.

Seven teams have new coaches, three teams open in new arenas, several big-name free agents signed with new teams, and there's seven a new director of hockey operations. The NHL also signed a new five-year, $600 million TV contract with Disney, meaning that after this season all games will be shown on the ABC and ESPN networks, with none on Fox.

New stars should get more TV air time with the retirement of longtime headliners Mike Gartner, Jari Kurri, Pat LaFontaine and Viacheslav Fetisov. But first, some established players will try to help the Red Wings win yet another title.

Repeat champions haven't been trendy in the NHL since the Pittsburgh Penguins in 1991-92. Detroit, however, has a mini-dynasty going with two straight sweeps in the finals and another appearance there in the last four seasons.

As soon as they defeated the Washington Capitals last spring, the Red Wings started talking about a three-peat. It would be hard to bet against the defending champions, who basically have the same team as last season along with the addition of free-agent defenseman Uwe Krupp.

"We feel confident in our team," right wing Darren McCarty said. "You look at the forwards, the same guys are back. There's no reason why we can't repeat."

Not that the Red Wings are a sure thing. Contending teams such as Dallas and Philadelphia improved themselves with free agents — forward Brett Hull, among others, with the Stars and goaltender John Vanbiesbrouck with the Flyers. Defenseman Steve Duchesne signed with the Los Angeles Kings, one of many improved teams in a well-balanced league.

There are now 27 teams in the NHL with the addition of the Nashville Predators, one of four new clubs joining the league by the year 2000. Over the next two seasons, Atlanta, Columbus, Ohio, and Minneapolis-St.Paul will enter the NHL to bring its total to 30.

The league for the first time will feature a two-conference, six-division setup: Atlantic, Northeast and Southeast in the Eastern Conference and the Central, Northwest and Pacific in the West. The Predators will play in the Central Division along with Chicago, Detroit and St. Louis.

The ice is also getting a new look.

The goal line has been moved from 11 to 13 feet from the end boards, giving players more space behind the net.

Tennis superstar Andre Agassi advances in Grand Slam Cup, berates USTA official

MUNICH, Germany (AP) — Andre Agassi spent more time lashing out at the outgoing U.S. Tennis Association president yesterday than it took him to advance to the quarterfinals of the Grand Slam Cup. Agassi, trying to justify his absence from last weekend's U.S. Davis Cup team's semifinal loss to Italy, said outgoing USTA president Harry Marmion was to blame for his not playing.

Without Agassi, Pete Sampras and Michael Chang, their top-ranked stars, the Americans lost 4-1.

Agassi's postmatch news conference took longer than his match — a 6-0, 6-0 thrashing of Cedric Pioline in 34 minutes, the quickest match since the inception of the Grand Slam Cup in 1990.

Agassi said he would have played the Davis Cup if the match had been scheduled for the West Coast, nearer to his Las Vegas residence, so that he could attend a charity event Saturday. The event raised $3.3 million for his foundation that helps children.

"It was very disappointing. I felt very bad for the guys there," Agassi said, adding that he had watched the match on television.

"It was very much the wrong call of the surface. The court was very slow. We gave Italy the best chance possible and they took advantage of it."

The hard surface inside the Milwaukee Arena was chosen by the Americans because it was supposed to favor their fast games. But it played more like the clay courts the Italians grew up on.

Agassi and Sampras have been criticized for refusing to play Davis Cup.

Agassi was upset by the choice of Milwaukee and said he wouldn't play in the final if the United States had advanced, saying, "If it was in my backyard, I wouldn't walk out the back door."

"I could have played on the West Coast, no problem," Agassi said yesterday.

"You have to be pathetic to take the best United States Davis Cup player and absolutely make him never want to play again. "He [Marmion] won't pick what the players need, what's best for the team. It's what's best for him."

Agassi said he had no problems playing for captain Tom

Gullikson, although "he's made some decisions that have been difficult for me to understand."

"Once Harry Marmion is out, I'll try to start new again with the next president," Agassi said.

Marmion's term expires at the end of the year. He is expected to be replaced by Judy Levering, who has been nominated as the next president. She will take over Jan. 1 if no other candidate files by Oct. 26.

Agassi said Marmion also was against him receiving a wild card for this $6.7 million tournament that nominally brings together players with the best records in the year's four Grand Slam events — the Australian, French and U.S. Open and Wimbledon.

But three men's Grand Slam champions of the year skipped the tournament despite its huge prize money — Wimbledon champion and top-ranked Sampras, U.S. Open champion Patrick Rafter, and Carlos Moya, the French Open champion. Only Australian Open champion Petr Korda is among the 12 men here.

Torre to stay in the Big Apple; Strawberry sits out for Yanks

NEW YORK (AP) — Joe Torre, who managed the New York Yankees to the most wins in American League history this season, has agreed to a two-year contract extension, the New York Post reported yesterday.

The newspaper, citing industry sources, said the extension begins following the 1999 season. Torre is making $1 million this season and next.

There was some speculation that Torre, 58, might retire if the Yankees won their second World Series in three years. New York is facing the Texas Rangers in the first round of the playoffs.

Torre guided the Yankees to the World Series title in 1996 and postseason appearances in each of his three years. New York, which won the AL East in 1996 and 1998, won 114 games, breaking the 1954 Cleveland Indians' mark of 111.

Owner George Steinbrenner hired Torre to replace Buck Showalter following the 1995 season. Torre's hiring was Steinbrenner's 20th managerial change since he bought the Yankees in 1973. Torre has also managed the New York Mets, Atlanta and St. Louis in his 17 years as manager.

Strawberry sits out Game 2

Darryl Strawberry, told that doctors had "found something" on his colon, left Yankee Stadium before Game 2 of last night's playoff game between New York and Texas to prepare for more tests.

Strawberry underwent a test in the morning, then went to the ballpark to talk to manager Joe Torre and his teammates. He left about four hours before the game.

Strawberry said doctors had discovered something the size of "a pimple" on his colon. More tests were planned for today, a travel day for the Yankees.

"If all goes well, he could join us in Texas for tomorrow night's game," Torre said. "We really won't know anything until tomorrow."

Torre did not disclose what Strawberry told him about his medical condition. The Yankees did not detail his condition, either.

"Cancer always comes to mind," Torre said. "It's something you're taught to fear."

Strawberry, 36, has recently been bothered by stomach cramps. When the Yankees played at Baltimore about 10 days ago, he spoke with his boyhood friend, Orioles outfielder Eric Davis, who battled colon cancer last year.

Davis said the first symptom of his illness was severe stomach pain, and that prompted Strawberry to seek medical attention.

"We don't want to think it's anything that serious," Yankees DH Chili Davis said during batting practice. "They don't know what's going on yet.

"He seemed pretty concerned about it. You could tell by the look on his face. It's something that could prevent him from playing in the postseason. But we don't want to get in a panic mode yet."

Strawberry, whose career has been full of comebacks from personal problems and injuries, hit .247 with 24 home runs and 57 RBIs in 101 games this season. The part-time outfielder and DH set an AL record with two pinch-hit grand slams.

In September, however, Strawberry hit just .229 with no home runs and only one RBI in 14 games.

"He was struggling a bit," Torre said.

The former New York Mets star signed with the Yankees in the middle of the 1996 season and helped them win the World Series that year. Strawberry was hoping to make more key contributions in the postseason this fall after a regular season in which the Yankees set an AL record with 114 victories.

Strawberry did not play in Game 1 of the division series, which New York won 2-0. Rookie Shane Spencer, whose six home runs made him the AL player of the week in the final week of the regular season, started in left field in Game 2 against Texas. Under baseball rules, a player cannot be replaced on the roster in the middle of a playoff series.

N.C. State must contend with McNabb

RALEIGH, N.C. (AP) — North Carolina State upset Florida State thanks to an imperfect quarterback performance from Chris Weinke.

The Wolfpack can't bank on the same from Syracuse's Donovan McNabb. While Weinke threw a school-record six interceptions against N.C. State (2-1) in a 24-7 Wolfpack win on Sept. 12, McNabb comes into tonight's game completing 76.1 percent of his passes in leading one of the nation's most prolific scoring teams.

"I hope we can score a lot of points," said Wolfpack coach Mike O'Cain. "I don't want to sell our defense short, but I think it would be asking an awful lot to expect them to hold Syracuse to 14 or 17 points. I'm not saying we can't, but we would have to have some help from Syracuse to do that."

And from McNabb, a senior who has yet to throw an interception for the 11th-ranked Orangemen, who have scored 35, 38 and 70 points en route to a 2-1 start.

"You can't expect a guy to play perfect every week," wide receiver Kevin Johnson said of his QB. "Donovan helps this team week in and week out. He's not God. But when he is on and he does play well, the team reaps the benefits. Donovan's been on all year, so we expect Donovan to stay hot."

So does O'Cain, who says it is Syracuse's running game that must be stopped, not necessarily McNabb.

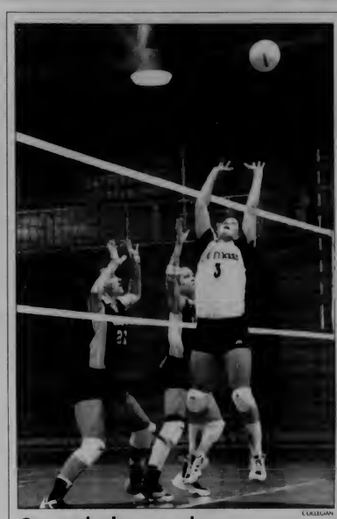
"I don't think you take him away, you must take his weapons away," O'Cain said of McNabb. "You have to do a great job in the secondary, you've got to do a great job up front in defending their running game. In essence, you've got to make him win the game.

"If you don't stop their running game, you don't have a chance. If you don't stop their running game you don't have a prayer."

McNabb will be facing a Wolfpack secondary that leads the nation with 10 interceptions, but the N.C. State run defense has been miserable, giving up 240 yards a game — 105th in the nation.

"They went through Michigan like they didn't have a defense out there for three quarters," O'Cain said of Syracuse, which was upset by the Wolfpack 32-31 in overtime in last year's season opener in the Carrier Dome. "Same thing against Tennessee and they have a pretty good defense."

McNabb won't be the only star offensive player on the field tonight. Wolfpack receiver Torry Holt is second in the nation in receiving yards and sixth in punt returns, while N.C.



State quarterback Jamie Barnette is 10th in the country in total offense at 294 yards a game.

"I don't know if there's a better wide receiver anywhere,"

Syracuse coach Paul Pasqualoni said of Holt, "He has taken over every game he's played, he's dominated every game this year."

Pasqualoni said his program has had trouble through the years handling mobile quarterbacks like Barnette, who he called a clone of McNabb.

"He's so quick and elusive that it's very, very hard to catch him. You just have to work hard in staying in your lanes. And sometimes when you're working hard on that, you're not getting up the field and you're not rushing the passer because you're so concerned you're out of your rush lane. It's a hard thing to balance.

Get on the bus, er, plane.

The UMass volleyball team is spending the weekend touring, as two road games are coming up on the schedule.

We don't wear GUESS?

Guess who got caught?
In 1996 the U.S. government caught Guess?, Inc. using sweatshops in Los Angeles. Guess contractors were discovered using illegal home sewing operations in 1996 and 1997. Guess could have cleaned up its act and made conditions better for the workers who produced their expensive designer jeans. But it didn't.

Guess who ran away to Mexico?
Guess ran away, moving production to Tehuacán, Mexico—1,700 miles from Los Angeles—where abuses of workers are more easily hidden from public view.

Guess who can't hide?
A fact finding delegation from the U.S. went to Mexico to investigate conditions in factories producing clothing for Guess?, Inc. According to their recent report, workers in these maquiladoras endure "forced and unpaid overtime," "child labor," "poverty and substandard living conditions," and "repression and fear."

Injustice. Don't buy it.

QBs falling out makes '98 an interesting year

The National Football League heads into week five of its season with various surprises in the standings, with various backup quarterbacks taking jobs from starters, and various key injuries playing into team performances.

Let's begin with the AFC Central.

where injuries have been a big part of the story. The first major injury was to Jim Harbaugh of the Baltimore Ravens (2–2). He was injured in week one and they have played Eric Zeier ever since, and he has lead them to two wins and a loss. Zeier was also named the official starter from here on out.

The Tennessee Oilers (1–3) have had some problems of their own. Steve "Air" McNair was forced to leave Sunday's 27–22 loss to the Jaguars, due to injury. Dave Krieg finished out the game. Even worse news is that Eddie George has been ineffective this year, as he has averaged 2.9 yards per carry.

The Bengals (1–3) have suffered an injury of their own as Neil O'Donnell was injured in their loss to the Ravens. The replacement for O'Donnell was Jeff Blake, who threw a touchdown pass to old friend Carl Pickens. Maybe Blake made a case for a starting job this weekend. After all, O'Donnell is 1–5 as a starter.

In the AFC West, things seem to be going according to plan. The Seahawks (3–1) are playing well and head to Kansas City to face the 3–1 Chiefs, who will serve as a real test for Warren Moon and company.

The Oakland Raiders (2–2) are once again underachieving. They have an immense amount of talent and yet can barely beat an average, Troy Aikman–less Dallas Cowboys team.

The surprise in the west has to be the Broncos (4–0). Not the fact that they're playing well, but the fact that they're still perfect without John Elway. Elway couldn't play this weekend due to a sore hammie and Bubby Brister has come in and dominated opposing defenses. Elway will rest again against the hopeless Eagles (0–4).

Speaking of the Eagles, coach Ray Rhodes has benched a young Bobby Hoying for Rodney Peete to try and spark his offense. This is the same coach who benched Randall Cunningham for Peete three years ago. Cunningham had how many touchdowns this weekend? Oh yeah, only four!

My pick of the year is still holding tight in the NFC East. The Arizona Cardinals (2–2) are tied at the top in the division and have won two straight. One must commend the Cardinals organization for not folding on soon–to–be– superstar, Jake Plummer, who has picked up his game in recent weeks.

As for Dallas, the 'Boys are going to need the return of injured quarterback Aikman. Without him they lose to an underachieving Raiders. They need Aikman just to be average.

In the NFC West, we have some stories, but the biggest one has to be the Saints, or should I say the 'Aints. The Saints are 3–0, but let's face it, who have they beaten? No one! They have wins over the Rams, Panthers and Colts, who have a combined win total of one game. The Saints have to play a team with two wins this week — the Pats (2– 1). This week the Saints go back to being the 'Aints of old.

The San Francisco 49ers are 3–0 after four weeks, and we had to expect that — that is, If Steve Young and Jerry Rice remained healthy. They have thus far. Young has thrown for three touchdowns per game and rushed for one this season. Rice has been the recipient of three of those touchdown passes.

Let's turn our attention to the black and blue division of the NFC Central. This is once again mostly likely to be the division that sends at least three teams to the playoffs. However, which team will be the third? We can rule out the Bears (0–4), but we need to factor in the Bucs and Lions, both 1–3. The Lions take to Soldier Field to face the hopeless Bears, as the Bucs take on the Giants. Both teams are beatable but the question remains: Who's going to get the job done.

Meanwhile, Monday Night Football will produce a classic this week when the undefeated Vikings (4–0) battle the undefeated Packers (4–0) for the rights to first place in the Central.

The only advantage the Packers bring into this game is Lambeau Field. The quarterbacks have been playing at the same clip thus far,

UMass jinxed in women's tennis

By Jenn Gaylord
Collegian Correspondent

Last Tuesday, the Massachusetts women's tennis team had a hotly contested tied match against Amherst College, but it was postponed on account of darkness and rescheduled for Tuesday, Sept. 29th.

This was a good thing for the Minutewomen, considering the momentum had switched in favor of Amherst College. However, switched momentum was not enough to break the jinx that has plagued the Minutewomen in recent matches against Amherst.

In the past three years, UMass has not beaten Amherst College. Massachusetts is behind in the all–time series, 0–2. The jinx continued with Tuesday's rescheduled match.

Before the match, coach Judy Dixon made a prediction.

"I think we're in trouble," Dixon said. "If our senior single No. 2 doesn't win, then we'll lose the match."

The coach's prediction was right. The team lost singles Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6, and in turn, they lost the whole match.

Junior Ola Gerasimova was defeated at the No. 1 singles by Jamie Cohen by scores of 6–2, 6–2, while freshman Helena Horak was beaten at No. 3 by Stephanie Fong by a score of 6–1, 6–2.

Although these singles were lost, the team had a great output from their No. 5 singles player, freshman Annie Hamilton. She came into Tuesday's match down 2–4 and came back to win the set.

Although the singles players performed slightly under par, the doubles teams faired rather well against the Lady Jeffs by taking all three matches.

Gerasimova and Horak took match No. 1 9–7, while senior co–captain Jackie Braunstein and Hamilton won No. 2 against Pastel and Vassilissa Kouzilina by a score of 8–6.

Lobovitz and senior co–captain Gillian Kane were victorious at the No. 3 match against Patricia Jo and Eleanor Mahoney, with a come–from–behind victory resulting in a winning score of 9–8 (7–4).

This was a strong effort from the team considering that Amherst College is ranked No. 3 in Division III Women's tennis in the country, up a spot from its No. 4 ranking last year.

The Minutewomen have a chance to redeem themselves today at 2 p.m. when they go up against the 75th–ranked team in the country, Dartmouth. The Big Green have beaten the UMass women in their last nine matches in the past two years and are the women's toughest opponent of the fall season.

Ajmal Basit will most likely be around to play against the Michigan Wolverines if they come to the Mullins Center in the 1999–2000 season.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

A visit by the Michigan Wolverines' men's basketball team to the William D. Mullins Center during the 1999–2000 season is a very real possibility.

The UMass and Michigan athletic departments were recently working together to finish crossing the t's and dotting the i's on the contract that will bring the nationally renowned Wolverines to Amherst.

"Bob (Marcum, the UMass athletic director) said we're still working on the final details on the contract," senior associate athletic director Al Roof said. "I'm sure the athletic department and the players and coaches are excited about the possibility.

"It would be a great opportunity for the people here at Amherst to have a program like Michigan come here to the Mullins Center. As I said, Bob was still working on the details as of yesterday, and hopefully that'll get ironed out soon."

A visit by Michigan would continue a strong scheduling tradition that the Minutemen have begun. This coming season, UMass will host the Kansas Jayhawks, who were ranked as high as No. 2 in the nation last year, and the Connecticut Huskies.

The Wolverines sported an impressive 25–9 overall record last season, and claimed the Big Ten Championship. Among the team's highlights in the 1997–98 season were victories against Duke (81–73) and Minnesota (65–57). Michigan also lit up the Indiana Hoosiers with 112 points a little less than a month before their season ended with a second–round NCAA tournament loss to UCLA.

In that loss, the Wolverines staged a ferocious comeback late in the contest before being held off, 85–82.

However, most of the talented Michigan roster will have been depleted by the '99–'00 season. The '98 Big Ten champs will loose at least six current players to graduation in the coming spring.

Among the familiar faces missing will be guard Louis Bullock, who is now a senior. Bullock led the squad in scoring last year with 17.1 points a game.

The Minutemen look to retain Mike Babul, Ajmal Basit, Monty Mack and Chris Kirkland, among others, making the tentative matchup currently favor UMass.

The local interest gathered by a contest pitting the Wolverines against the Minutemen at the Mullins Center would hypothetically reap immeasurable financial benefits for the Pioneer Valley region, and, of course, the University of Massachusetts.

This revenue, however, would be the secondary benefit to the student population, who would again get a chance to see the best the NCAA has to offer.

Despite chances, Red Sox lose Game 2 in Cleveland

CLEVELAND (AP) — Once the Indians got mad, they got even. Feeding off the energy created by the ejections of manager Mike Hargrove and starting pitcher Dwight Gooden in the first inning, Cleveland tied up its AL playoff series with Boston at one game apiece yesterday, beating the Red Sox 9-5.

"Well, it proved they can play better without me," said Hargrove, who had cooled down enough after the game that he could joke about his ejection. "I think that the byproduct of it was it turned up our intensity and it turned our fans' intensity up."

Dave Burba, rushed into service when Gooden was tossed after 22 pitches, made it into the sixth inning, and David Justice homered and drove in four runs for the Indians.

After being routed 11-3 in Game 1, Cleveland needed a lift. And although they certainly didn't plan to spend the rest of the day watching TV in Cleveland's clubhouse, Hargrove and Gooden sparked the Indians and their fans by getting kicked out by plate umpire Joe Brinkman.

"Yesterday, we were the worst team in baseball," Sandy Alomar said. "Today, we're even."

The Indians' turnaround was nothing new to Hargrove, who has seen his team rebound from adversity many times.

"For a long time, not only this year but also last year, this team has had plenty of chances to go belly up and quit. They've never done that," the manager said.

The best-of-5 series continues tomorrow afternoon at Fenway Park with Cleveland's Charles Nagy facing Bret Saberhagen. Game 4 is set for Saturday, and the teams would return to Jacobs Field for Game 5 on Sunday if necessary.

Game 2 will be best remembered for a wild, 39-minute first inning that included the ejections, three runs, two passed balls, three walks, two stolen bases, a hit batter, two controversial calls and a lot of heated words.

There was more tension in the ninth when both benches and bullpens emptied briefly after John Valentin took exception to an inside pitch from Indians reliever Mike Jackson, who picked up the save.

Mo Vaughn, who had a postseason record seven RBIs in the series opener, went 1-for-4 with two strikeouts and a walk.

Gooden, seeking his first postseason win, was in trouble with Brinkman after just his third pitch. He disagreed with the umpire on a 2-0 pitch to leadoff hitter Darren Lewis, yelling when Brinkman called ball three.

The umpire started out from behind the plate as Gooden motioned to him that things were OK and he would continue. Hargrove came out to calm his pitcher, but on his way back to the bench, he argued with Brinkman and was quickly tossed.

"For me, it's one of those things that happens in the heat of battle where everybody's competitive, especially in this situation," Hargrove said. "It was just a difference of opinion. I did what I had to do and Joe did what he had to do."

Smoltz, Braves rip apart Chicago in NL playoffs

ATLANTA (AP) — John Smoltz's dominating performance on the mound was expected.

Michael Tucker's power at the plate wasn't.

Smoltz became the winningest pitcher in postseason history, allowing only five hits in 7 2/3 innings as the Atlanta Braves cruised to a 7-1 victory over the Chicago Cubs in Game 1 of the NL division series yesterday.

Tucker, who had just two home runs in the past three months and was dropped to eighth in the batting order, got the offense going with a two-run homer in the second inning.

Ryan Klesko turned the game into, a rout with a seventh-inning grand slam against Matt Karchner, but the runs really weren't needed with Smoltz on the mound.

He pushed his record to 11-3 in 21 postseason starts, breaking the record for wins shared with Whitey Ford and Dave Stewart.

Smoltz was picked for Game 1 based on his playoff success and a 12-1 record in the second half of the season.

The Braves' pitching is so deep they have 20-game winner Tom Glavine and four-time Cy Young winner Greg Maddux ready to go in the next two games.

Embassy bombing suspect linked to Islamic militia

DAR ES SALAAM, Tanzania (AP) — A man charged in the U.S. Embassy bombing in Tanzania has confessed to having links to Islamic militant Osama bin Laden, the suspected mastermind behind the attacks here in Tanzania and in neighboring Kenya, a senior government official said yesterday.

Home Affairs Minister Ali Ameir Mohamed told The Associated Press that Mustafa Mahmoud Said Ahmed, one of two men charged in the Dar es Salaam bombing, also said he knew two men charged in a New York federal court for the Nairobi bombing.

"Mustafa [Ahmed] is either the mastermind behind the [Tanzania] bombing or is a key person in the bombing conspiracy," Ameir stated. Ameir also said Ahmed, an Egyptian with passports from Yemen, Congo and Iraq, admitted that he had warned Kenyan intelligence officials about the plot to bomb the U.S. embassies. He said Ahmed warned the Kenyans then told the CIA.

Ameir told reporters he believed the Egyptian, whom he called "wily and elusive," was not telling investigators everything he knew about the bombings.

Ahmed and Rashid Saleh Hemed, a Tanzanian from Zanzibar, were formally charged Sept. 21 with 11 counts of murder in the Aug. 7 blast.

Texas Authorities test "Y2K" bug, responses

LUBBOCK, Texas (AP) — High-tech doomsday arrived early in this west Texas city.

With just 457 days before the so-called "Y2K" bug hits, city officials speeded up the clocks to test their readiness for the chaos many believe could occur if essential city computers fail to recognize the new millennium.

City crews, including police, fire and utility workers, were assembled to simulate massive computer failures in the midst of mock natural disasters. Also planned were computer failures so serious they could cause disasters themselves.

The drills involved test conductors sending e-mail messages to city officials notifying them of problems or failed systems while another system was set up to judge response time.

Exactly what or when the "disasters" would occur was kept secret until the drills started Wednesday evening. The only thing announced was a four-hour window, starting at 5 p.m., when anything could happen.

"This is not about us trying to prove we are ready for this, this is about us seeing the holes that may exist because we've never faced anything like this before," said city spokesman Tony Privett. "There is absolutely no manual on how to handle this."

$10 million in funding added to UM budget

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David K. Scott has announced that $10 million has been added to the new budget for the 1999 fiscal year, which started July 1.

Of the 22.6 million in new monies the state gave to the University system, the Amherst campus received $8.4 million. According to Joyce Hatch, associate vice chancellor for finance and budget, the campus is receiving $204 million total from the state, plus $1.75 million for Commonwealth College, the state's new honors college and "distance learning hub." Last year's base allocation, money designated for a certain department or area of the campus, was $196 million. Hatch said the money for state funding comes from taxes.

In addition to the $8.4 million from the state, the University also has two million dollars from the early retirement savings plan which was terminated this past year. The early retirement savings plan consists of money set aside for three years to pay retiring faculty. The majority of these people have retired, the cost of the program has been paid and about two million dollars remain. The amount of money that remains was also affected by the fact that no one was hired to replace retiring faculty members.

According to Scott, the two million left from the early retirement savings, along with the 8.4 million from the state, will be used to fund the improvement of information technology and infrastructure, expand scholarship programs, and support its key areas of the campus's strategic action plan.

Scott also said that spending has remained mostly on track since the budget priorities were decided in the fiscal year 96. "The most significant change [from what was projected] is the steady increase in scholarships with the introduction of the valedictorian–salutatorian program and the loss of tuition waivers."

Hatch said that when the state auditors looked at the legitimate tuition waivers, one million dollars worth were not in compliance with the Board of Higher Education Policy. Therefore, the school had to pay for them out of the budget.

Scott credited President William M. Bulger, the Board of Trustees, along with legislators, particularly Senator Stan Rosenberg (D–Amherst) chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, for the increase in state funding.

Scott also said that the campus should continue to strive to achieve its goal of "becoming a leading land grant university with membership in the Association of American Universities." Schools that are members of the AAU are major research universities and/or institutions, said Hatch.

Around $1,346,000 will go to the University Scholars Program, while $120,000 will go to the fourth year of the Commonwealth Scholars Program. Two million dollars is set aside to be invested for facility repair and renovations.

About 2.1 million will be used to fund the following aspects of the Strategic Action plan: faculty and staff investment, libraries and programs of excellence, research funds and graduate student support, advising and retentions, diversity and creation of community. Within that $2.1 million, $485,000 will go to the computer science department to hire an additional faculty member and a technician, to the chemistry department to replace a retired faculty member, to financial support for a staff member in the biological sciences department who will take care of the specimen collections used for instruction and research, and to help replace two college of engineering faculty who retired.

Funding will also go to the Fine Arts Center to find new leadership and staff support for the Massachusetts Center for Renaissance Studies. The library system will be provided with $360,000 to provide additional staffing. Other monies will create jobs participating in the Center for Public Policy and Administration.

UMass accreditation up for review

By Erin Renner
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts will be under scrutiny this month when it is evaluated by the New England Association of Schools and Colleges.

The Association is planning to visit the Amherst campus from Oct. 25–28 to evaluate the University for re–accreditation.

The Association's purpose for the review is to determine the University's educational quality and to push schools to work toward improvement. It will also be looking for strengths and weaknesses in the University through the review process.

"In general the whole review is very healthy for a school to do because it makes each program take a step back and look at themselves, to ask themselves where they want to be," said News Director Kavi Scanlon. "When you have to defend yourself as a program you have to look closely."

For the past year and a half, Associate Chancellor James Leheny has coordinated a self–study to examine the University. The study addresses the Association's eleven "Standards for Accreditation."

Some of the accreditation criteria includes Faculty, Student Services, Financial Resources, Integrity, Organization and Governance, and Programs and Instruction in four areas: Undergraduate Education, Graduate Education, Research and Scholarship and Outreach.

The Association will send a team to evaluate how thoroughly and accurately the reports of the self–study are. The team, chaired by John Di Biaggo, president of Tufts University, will make his recommendations to the Commission on Institutions of Higher Education, of which the Association is a sector of, and the Commission will issue a final report after their review.

The Commission reviews the University every 10 years. The then–named Massachusetts State College was first accredited in 1932. Since the last time UMass was accredited in 1988, many changes and improvements have been made.

In 1991, the five UMass campuses were consolidated into a single sector under one governing board with

Georges damage amounts to billions

By James Anderson
Associated Press

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — It plowed over and past 17 Caribbean islands, crashing into the lives of more than 30 million people.

As each island fell prey to Hurricane Georges' battering winds, the casualties mounted.

They are mounting still. And as they do, island nations are coming to grips with lost harvests, wrecked government buildings, lost tourist income and growing populations of newly homeless. Many past hurricanes damaged only a few islands. Repairs were often quick.

Georges was different. It swept past island after island in the northern Caribbean, causing billions of dollars in destruction and killing at least 400 people.

In some nations, like tiny St. Kitts, Georges ruined the crucial winter tourism season and sugar crop on which the islanders stake their lives.

In the Dominican Republic, the immediate concern is survival. More than a week after Georges' 110 mph winds hit, searchers were still looking for survivors in towns swamped by flooding and coming through deep muck in the grim task of finding the dead. The numbers of homeless are staggering: More than 100,000 in the Dominican Republic, 18,000 and counting in Haiti, at least 17,000 in the U.S. territory of Puerto Rico, and 3,000 in St. Kitts — a tenth of that island's population. Along with shelter, the refugees need food, water, ice, clothing — needs that have overwhelmed the region's small economies and taxed the disaster response capabilities of the United States, France and other donor nations.

Damage to popular hotels like Puerto Rico's bluff-top El Conquistador Resort, and splintered windows in oceanfront condominiums, underscore a physical and economic vulnerability that the Caribbean's people know but would rather forget.

There was a surprise bright spot: The U.S. Virgin Islands — battered by Hurricane Hugo in 1989 and 1995's Marilyn, which destroyed 80 percent of the homes on St. Thomas — emerged relatively unscathed despite being in Georges' path.

"It's a miracle," crowed Elizabeth Armstrong, general manager of the Buccaneer Hotel on St. Croix.

Still, Armstrong worries tourists will be scared away from the Virgin Islands by Georges' rampage elsewhere. "It was such a big storm that I'm afraid people will believe the whole Caribbean was damaged," Armstrong said.

Much of it was. Airline service and shipping were disrupted. Entire islands plunged into darkness — including Puerto Rico and its 4 million people — and thousands of businesses closed. The storm's economic cost has yet to be calculated. In Puerto Rico alone, property damage has surpassed $2 billion.

Without power, food spoiled in refrigerators and lights broke out in hours-long ice lines. Beneath a canopy of suddenly bright stars over San Juan, candles flickered in windows and drivers negotiated streets made unfamiliar by fallen trees and the enveloping dark.

Given the Caribbean's dependence on tourism — it earns $14 billion a year and employs half a million people — promoters are emphasizing the rapid rebuilding in such places as Puerto Rico and Antigua. And they note that in the Windward Islands in the southeastern Caribbean and in Jamaica, it is business as usual. In San Juan, giant white cruise ships, their lights blazing across San Juan Bay, have resumed their weekly visits. Spectacular pink and purple sunsets have returned, a dramatic backdrop to the commited navy of surfers and boogie boarders riding the waves off Condado beach. Old San Juan's blue cobblestone streets are bustling again with strollers and shoppers.

Still, Antigua, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Puerto Rico and St. Kitts could lose tourism in coming months, said Michael Spinks of the Barbados-based Caribbean Tourism Organization.

Last year, more than 1.7 million non-cruise tourists visited the Dominican Republic, and Cuba and Puerto Rico welcomed more than 1.1 million each. St. Kitts and Nevis earned more than $25 million from tourists.

UM alcohol policy strict compared to local colleges

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

For those of you who are saddened by the recent changes in the University of Massachusetts' alcohol policy and have been wondering about how other schools in the area deal with drinking, here is a comparison.

Yes, unlike UMass, beer kegs are permitted according to Hampshire and Amherst Colleges' stated alcohol policies. However, at Hampshire, the "prior approval of the appropriate professional house staff for parties in student residences, the appropriate student affairs professional for all campus events, or the director of public safety for other events" is required. A permit from the town of Amherst needs to be obtained as well.

At Amherst, kegs are "not permitted in freshman and mixed class dorms." Students who violate this "will be subject to a $100 fine and seizure of the kegs."

And at UMass, as we all should know by now: "Keg, beer balls, and other large volume containers that contain alcoholic beverages are not permitted."

Both Amherst and Hampshire Colleges state that at any gathering where there is alcohol being served "non–alcoholic beverages and food must be provided in adequate proportion to the alcoholic beverages on hand."

As for sanctions in the other schools:

For Amherst, "If any of the above policies is violated, Campus Security may close down the event. Town Police will shut down parties which are the cause of noise complaints by local residents. Violators of the town's noise ordinance may receive summonses from the Town Police and may be subject to fines and possible arrest."

At Hampshire, "If a student violates this policy, disciplinary action up to and including expulsion and referral for prosecution may result as deemed appropriate."

According to Derrick Elmes, director of public safety at Hampshire College, infractions are dealt with depending on the size of the infraction, meaning some are dealt with by those in charge of residential halls, while others are dealt with by the deans. Elmes said that the amount of last year's infraction was "average."

Takeover–inspired documentary brings panel discussion to campus

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

"How can we make people aware of racism?"

This was one of the questions on the black and white flyers posted around campus promoting the panel discussion on racism Thursday night. The heart of the discussion revolved around a documentary by senior psychology student Tony Jno Baptiste.

Baptiste was an active participant in the Goodell Takeover whose experience with racism caused him to make the documentary.

Speaking with a smooth, metaphorical language, Baptiste shared some of the pain caused to him when his picture was "reprogrammed" into a devil by music group Skindog's Army last April. For the most part, however, Baptiste let his documentary do most of the explaining.

Using clips of friends about the effects of the experience of the takeover along with allusions to "Little Red Riding Hood" by children, Baptiste worked with a variety of images to portray his experience and convey his message of racism's painful effects. In explaining the psychology of these effects, psychologist and professor in the social justice education department, William Cross described the stages individuals go through when dealing with racism.

The panel discussion, conducted by four University of Massachusetts staff and faculty, highlighted many of the problems racism stems from, the psychological effects, and the need for a greater education and awareness by all races.

"It's not an equal playing field and it makes me sad when people say there isn't racism," said Linda Robinson, University of Massachusetts instructor and doctorate student, who spoke about the need for equality in education.

Asian, Latino, African, and Native American (ALANA) director Nelson Acosta, who also sat on the panel, furthered Robinson's remarks by referring to racism as a "social disease" which will only be wiped away by taking the "...challenge to further

Gomez to speak at Conference

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

On Saturday October 3, the W.E.B. DuBois Library, along with Latina Promoviendo Comunidad and La Unidad Latina, will sponsor the Hispamerica Conference. Opening sessions will begin at 9:30 a.m. in Herter Hall room 231. Martin Gomez, Executive Director of the Brooklyn Public Library, will be featured as the keynote speaker.

Gomez has led the Brooklyn Public Library, which is the fifth–largest library system in the United States, since September 1995. As executive director of this independent nonprofit corporation with an annual operating budget of $70 million, he established Brooklyn's first Multilingual Center. The Multilingual Center provides access to exceptional library service to the hundreds of thousands of immigrants among Brooklyn's 2.5 million residents.

Gomez sits on the American Library Association Executive Board, and serves as a liaison to the Freedom to Read Foundation. He is also a board member of the Metropolitan New York Library Council. Other memberships include the New York State Regents Commission on Library Services, Board of Advisors for the Pratt Institute School of Information and Library Science, and the Regents Advisory Council on Libraries. Gomez is also a member of the Board of the National Video Resources, an initiative of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Among his recent honors are a 1998 Honorary Doctor of Laws degree from St. Joseph's College, Brooklyn; the 1998 "Homero Rosado Leadership Award" from the Spanish Speaking Elderly Council–RAICES; the 1997 Brooklyn's Friends School's Festividad de Amigos award for fostering educational and business partnerships; and the 1997 Brooklyn District Attorney's "Arts Award for Hispanic Leadership."

Before coming to Brooklyn, Gomez directed the Oakland Public Library in California. Previously, he was Director of the Chicago Public Library Cultural Center and a Chicago Public Library District Chief.

Gomez is a graduate of the University of California, Los Angeles, where he earned a bachelor of arts degree in English in 1975. He received a masters in Library Science from the University of Arizona, Tucson in 1976.

The conference will address issues such as careers, internet service, community needs, education, business information, literature, identity, and politics, as relevant to the Latino community. These issues will be addressed mainly through workshops. Pre–registration for the workshops are required. You can pre–register Saturday between 9:00 a.m. and 9:30 a.m. on the second floor of Herter Hall. All are welcome.

Amherst as the flagship campus.

After this merger, former UMass President Michael Hooker drafted an "Amherst Campus Vision Statement" which was approved by the Board of Trustees in 1992. The statement included components such as global competitiveness and quality of life among others.

Then in 1996, Chancellor David K. Scott revised Hooker's statement with aspirations to more clearly define the goal of obtaining membership in the Association of American Universities (AAU) and be a land grant university.

Membership into the AAU would put UMass in the company of the 17 top rated public Universities in the country.

Scott's statement, named the "Strategic Action Plan," also includes the mission of having continuing evolution as a multicultural community.

This is an addition to Hooker's statement, which received criticism for being a plan that worked backwards, from the top down.

In contrast to Hooker's statement, Scott hopes to incorporate a broader base of opinion in his plan for development.

In 1997 the faculty senate formally endorsed Scott's "Strategic Action Plan." The planning horizon for Scott's goals was five years from 1996–2001. He will soon begin to discuss the next planning phase of the University.

However, the evaluation team will not only be examining the University, but they will also be seeking comments.

Comments must be written and signed, and will not be treated as confidential. All comments must be received by Oct. 28 and should include a name, address and telephone number of the person providing the comments.

educate yourself."

Panelist and associate professor of political science, Dean Robinson, pointed out the destructive nature racism has on self–esteem. Robinson explained this ideology as a Darwinian "survival of the fittest" applied to humans, which needs to be fixed by government policies.

Graffiti on the flyers posted for the discussion showed evidence of students confusion as to the intent of the flyer, which depicted the white image of Baptiste with horns. One flyer had written on it — "I find it fascinating this image supports racism." Another flyer — "Makes you wonder if they know what they are talking about." And yet another flyer — "I don't attack the creators of this image, I just want them to think more about what they are doing."

Jamie Arroyo, president of the Lambda Upsilon Lambda fraternity, which hosted the discussion, responded to the graffiti saying — "I can definitely understand why people might take that as a white devil but ...before you [students writing graffiti] pass judgement, you should have come to the discussion."

The boob tube

So, for the first time ever in my college career, I did what I said I would never do. I broke down and brought a TV to school. All summer, my mother was pushing the idea. Buy one, she said. Spend a little money and get a nice one. Now, when it comes to money, as my girlfriend will tell you, I'm a "cheap bastard." I hoard what I earn all summer in the hopes of not having to work during the school year, and I wasn't about to blow even a buck fifty on something as pointless as a TV. I don't need it. I reasoned. I've survived four years of college without one. Besides, I was looking forward to going back to school and all the social opportunities that my return would offer. What the hell did I need a TV for? And, with a few (very few) exceptions, TV is still as vast a wasteland as ever.

Paul Martinez

Just as I had killed off any desire I may have had for a television, my birthday rolled around, and of course I got what I didn't want or need. But at the same time, I had to admit, it was going to be nice to be able to watch the news and maybe the "Daily Show" without walking to my friend's building (all right, it's only about a hundred feet away, but so what?). Still, it sat in its box, untouched, until the end of the summer. Of course I appreciated the gift, but again, I thought, how often would I actually use it? I go to a school with fifteen thousand undergrads and live in an area with four other colleges in it. I can find ways to entertain myself.

Except for the fact that, as I get closer to the quarter century mark, I find that I don't like going out anymore. I like coming home after work, sitting down with my girlfriend, and either renting a movie or watching "my TV — and recently, my tastes have run towards the lowest common denominator. I like feeling brain cells die, and since I rarely drink anymore, I have to find some way to keep actual thinking from taking place. I find that network TV fits my needs perfectly. After half an hour of "Home Improvement," I can feel my jaw slackening as the overwhelming urge to belch and grunt unintelligibly consumes me. It's just like drinking! I don't even need human interaction anymore, except for the people who take my card at the dining common. Even they have taken on a sitcom quality, kind of like Brett Butler or Roseanne. I imagine them going home to three-walled TV sets and exchanging witty banter with their smart-ass family.

You know, before I got the TV, I used to have other things I enjoyed doing. Going for a walk on a nice day. Listening to some Charlie Parker, maybe just sitting out in the sun. Now I spend my afternoons gorging on chocolate and watching soap operas — purely to see how bad they are, really. I haven't seen the sun in a few days, since I've kept the shades pulled to hide my grotesque, chocolate-smeared form. My days are so full the I don't have time for those pesky classes I used bother with.

With my newfound freedom of entertainment, I've discovered the joys of all the movies I never wanted to see (Screams! and all those I wish I never had that have become part of my permanent memory (Revenge of the Nerds and Back to School, for example). Of course, when I suddenly realize that I've wasted six hours watching HSCN; missing lunch, hanging out with my friends, and life in general, I feel a little bit like a loser. It's okay, though; all this little problem requires is a change in perspective, and another bag of Olestra chips. I've realized that I am no mere couch potato. No, I'm important. I have a purpose. I am a cultural researcher.

Now stay with me on this one. See, as I figure it, Americans, being the fattest nation on Earth as well as one of the richest, probably watch a lot of TV. You just don't get a 60 percent obesity rate in countries where people are busy slaving away in factories for pennies a day to make shoes they can never afford. Since TV is a business, it shows us what we want to see, both in advertising and in programming. It reflects the values and social world of modern America, kind of like a bloated corporate mirror.

Commercials are perhaps the worst thing about television, but to me they also offer the most insight into the wants and needs of the average American because they play such a large role in creating them. For instance, I never wanted a sports utility vehicle or even knew what a Cinnabun was before I got my TV. Now I gleefully drive over protected flora, wasting obscene amounts of gas while scarfing down box after box of hot, cinnamon goodness. You know. I used to feel bad about the impact we Americans make on the environment because of our dependence on cheap fossil fuels. What the hell was I thinking?

Anyway, where was I? Oh yeah — TV as both a reflection and cause of the warped consumerist character of the American mindset. I'd expand, but I've sacrificed my attention span in the name of my research. Besides, Jerry Springer is on and I have a pint of Heavenly Hash calling my name. If you don't hear from me in a week, call the police and help them pry my bloated butt off my bed.

Free for all?

The other night, I was hanging out in Haymarket in Northampton with a friend (if you feel like breaking the routine of studying the "classics" such as the history of Samuel Adams and Arthur Guinness, this dive is the place to check out), when a guy came up to us and asked us if we wanted tickets to a show, "free tickets."

The skeptic in me automatically began to question him about the whole transaction. I mean, "free" tickets, I was expecting to see a Nelson cover band or maybe Damn Yankees on the town common. Anyway, we took the tickets and went to the Iron Horse, where studying the aforementioned "classics" are a prerequisite, and took our seats.

"Then you're hooked and there is no turning back. One charge leads to another, all for a box of Ju-Ju Bee's."

Ken McDonald

The concert ended up being one of the best shows I have ever seen, and all for the price of a ride on the PVTA. Sometimes the "shows" displayed on the way back from Pufton on a Friday night are well worth the fare as well.

So, my question is, why would some random guy just approach me and give away two $18 tickets? I wish I knew who this person was, because I want to thank him.

If you think about it, there is nothing that is actually free anymore. Yeah, you can get a cell phone for a penny, but you have to take out a personal loan to cover the roaming charges for crossing the street.

You fill out the credit card application outside the DC and in return get a bag of M&M's or a t-shirt (if you choose the candy, then we really need to talk). In a month you get a credit card (if you gave the person your real name) and turn around and cut it up, right? Or, do you run out of cash and need that calzone at midnight? If you choose the calzone, you're hooked and there is no turning back. One charge leads to another, all for a box of Ju-Ju Bee's.

"Fat free" products have enough carcinogens in them to kill a horse. Fat free Twinkies are an oxymoron that would take another column to figure out.

The word "free" is one of the most powerful in the English language. The others cannot be mentioned on this page. When you hear the word free, you automatically turn your head and look to see what it is that is being handed away. It doesn't matter if you are the most thrifty person or the least, free is free... or is it?

The best one is "buy one, get two free," this one kills me. You go to the local supermarket and see a sign saying that if you buy one liter of X brand cola, you get two free. Not many people stop and see that last week a bottle of "X" cola was selling for 99 cents, now it is $2.49. In reality, the sode takes 25 cents to make, pretty clever, huh? Yet, without fail, droves of people line up outside for sugar free crap and diet whyamIbuyingthis. Stores keep you going by switching the brands on sale every week or so.

Hey, I learned something in my glorious two year stint as a cashier.

Sometimes free is good though. I think every college guy depends on that shave gel that you pick up for no charge in those survival packets. If you're like me and have to shave as often as Marcus Camby spells his name correctly, you sell the stuff for a profit.

People scream about free speech, but are censored for promoting what they believe. Not to dwell on the "Land of the Free" thing, but a nation where there are still Native American Reservations and civil rights violations abound, cannot truly be called "free."

"Free" is truly an amazing word. Just be careful, whether it is free speech or free toothpaste, somewhere, someone is sitting behind a desk, laughing their way to the bank.

Moderation explained

We were all sitting around watching The American President, when our host (Okay, the girl whose room we invaded; still, in a way she was our host) announces that she intends on becoming President of the United States some day. Of course, being conditioned as an English major, my first thought was, "Can you get me a nice easy cabinet job?" Well, she said she'd think about it, and the conversation eventually turned to other things, leaving me thinking.

Anyone can become President (Okay, ignoring the age limit and an outdated must-be-a-citizen rule). But, anyone can just as easily become a burnt-out crack head. Anyone can appear on "Jeopardy!" Anyone can appear (with their face digitally changed) on "Cops." Anyone can end up with 2.3 children and have a normal "average" life. Anyone can... well, you get the point. Anyone can become anything.

So what determines where we end up?

Is there some cosmic wheel that assigns us the random events that make up our lives? Is there really a God up there planning everyone's life out to the point that it is pre- determined whether or not someone will drink decaf versus regular, or eat Lucky Charms instead of Fruit Loops? Why do I keep asking these questions? Granted, that one is easy: I needed an extra paragraph and really wanted to include a reference to God and Lucky Charms in the same sentence.

Anyway, back to what might turn into an actual point: we are all dropped on this Earth and forced to deal with life as it comes. Love, pain, homework, insecurities, sickness, and thousands of other things are what we must face everyday. Since I can't figure out the who, what, where, why, and how we are dealt life, I might as well try to explain what might be the best way to deal with it.

Thousands of years have been spent by people greater than I working on this very problem, so I ain't promising much with my solution. Still, it seems to hit a little more than it misses, so it's worth a shot. My miracle solution (you can forget the drum roll) is that when dealing with life we must try to avoid extremes.

"This is simply because extremes are unhealthy. If they weren't, they wouldn't be known as "extremes."

Chris Collins

This is simply because extremes are unhealthy. If they weren't, they wouldn't be known as "extremes."

For example (not that any students can relate to this) going out and getting smashed, trashed, drunk or otherwise messed up tends to be an extreme behavior. Of course, not being able to enjoy life, not being able to get your head out of a book every once in a while, is an equally extreme behavior. One does its damage physically, the other mentally, but ultimately both extremes are not helpful in keeping a person working the way a person is meant to function. Thus, they should both be avoided.

Moderation may seem to be a silly banner to live under in a world where some people own more shoes then there are states in the union. In a place where people are encouraged to go to excess in their beliefs, tastes, and life in general, avoiding excess would appear to be as taboo as killing a baby seal. Moderation, in reality, does make sense. The moderate person tends to avoid ridiculous arguments, especially when it comes to politics. And moderates are easier to get along with than those extremists so secure in their beliefs that they find themselves cramming what they think is "right" down the throats of all those that they meet.

Which isn't to say that all extremes are wrong. However, it is to say that doing a great deal of extreme things is dangerous. For example, going rock climbing with no ropes is an extreme thing, but if one is lucky, that one extreme time is not going to adversely affect one's life. Of course, do this enough times and you will get personal experience concerning the difference between yourself and Wile E. Coyote. (For the record, the splat! is much louder and much, much more permanent.)

So, I guess what I'm trying to say is that we all need to pick our sins carefully, because life is notorious for tackling us with nasty curve balls and even nastier mixed metaphors. So, take the middle road of moderation when you can, lest some day you will wake up as a crack addict who could have been President. Or worse, a President who could have been a crack addict.

New Manson drowns in clichés

By Anna Feder

MECHANICAL ANIMALS
Marilyn Manson
Nothing/Interscope

Marilyn Manson have yet to prove with this fourth album, Mechanical Animals, that they have anything truly different to offer. As the title to which sounds like something out of a Phillip K. Dick novell suggests, it is more on the "mechanical," synthetic side.

Even the androgynous image of frontman Mr. Manson as "Omega," his Bowie esque alter-ego, adorning the cover confirms their place in music history as nothing more than shock-rockers. The lyrics seem to have degenerated from their 1994 debut, Portrait of an American Family, and the band has strayed from the more creepy sound that characterized their previous releases. Lyrics like "And I dreamed I was a spaceman/Burned like a moth in a flame," from the album's first track, "Great Big White World," exemplify just how trite Marilyn Manson can be.

The themes underlying the album are simple clichés as well. Emptiness, Drugs and Religion should have been the title encompassing the body of these songs: themes the Reverend Manson and family have bludgeoned us with since their last album, 1996's Antichrist Superstar.

Manson has managed to prove himself the minister of apathy, crooning to an even more apathetic post-Generation X on "Disassociative." If there is a message, it is lost in songs like "Dope Show," the first single released off Mechanical Animals. Using a lot of buzz words, but not actually saying anything, it leaves one wondering if Marilyn Manson have suddenly become the spokesmen for D.A.R.E.

There are a few bright spots to this generally dim commercial animal. The title track, "Mechanical Animals," shows a glint of lyrical creativity. They also take a break from their derivative industrial noise on "The Speed of Pain." They even manage to crank out a sort of love song with "The Last Day on Earth."

Mechanical Animals leaves the listener with a better definition concerning the lengths Marilyn Manson will go to sell an album: this album wastes what little talent they have on shock-value images and trendy words. The group should have stuck with the sound they crafted on their first two albums. Their original sound wasn't monumental, it didn't make them hugely popular, but at least it was theirs. C-

Weekend fashion tips

A lot of you think you can get away with wearing anything, but oh my, are you ever wrong! Clothes can reflect a lot about a person. They can show their styles, beliefs and personalities. However, it is also important to remember that you can not completely judge a person based on their appearance. We want to stress that this article is only our opinion and we realize that people have their own unique styles. We aren't trying to compromise individuality ("one man's trash is another man's treasure"), but we are trying to save you poor souls who are lost in fashion limbo. Just because we think that jelly shoes are "out" doesn't mean you can't go right ahead and prove us wrong.

Cythia Santostuosso and Jacob Fanning

Our topic today is what to wear this weekend. So listen up all of you freshmen and new students, this one is for you. You've probably discovered that every weekend at UMass is a party weekend and you're going to want to look good; whether you're hitting the frats, off-campus parties, or just chilling in the dorms. You may be heading to those parties to hang with your friends, or your sole reason for attending may be to meet members of the opposite sex. In any case, you should look snazzy, especially if you're trying to nab that special someone.

We have come up with an incredibly versatile outfit for the ladies that can be worn to virtually any party on this campus. First you need pants. The two best options are nice jeans or black pants. Flared jeans are all the rage now, so those look most excellent. If you're short and can't pull off the flared look, then try boot cut or low rise jeans. When we talk about black pants, we're not talking about any old pair of black pants. We're talking about those tight ones that you've been known to turn quite a few heads in.

Now, for the shirt, we strongly recommend a dark colored tank top or short-sleeved shirt for several reasons. First of all, you will be able to keep as cool as you possibly can when the temperature of the party rises to 200 degrees or so. Secondly, you'll probably end up getting doused in beer by some drunken lush. Stains won't show up on a dark shirt, but on a light one...Oh, it's too painful to even think about. Thirdly, by the end of the night, you'll most likely be that drunken lush spilling beer all over yourself.

Moving on, we come to the shoes. We suggest something fun with a slight heel. Nothing too big or awkward though, because your chances of executing a swan dive onto the pavement increases dramatically. Now, if you're not klutzy, and can pull off hig shoes, then by all means go for it. But the key is to combine style and comfort, because you're going to want to bust a move on the dance floor without your feet being in excruciating pain. Also remember that booze and heels don't mesh well.

Now, your clothes look great, but what about makeup and hair? Go simple with makeup; play up your eyes or whatever your best feature is. Use fun colors, but nothing too crazy. Remember that most of it will melt off in the steamy climate any way. Keep your hair simple, too. Any complicated style is bound to fall out; so don't spend hours on that special look, just keep it natural.

Here are a few tips for the fellas. They're not guaranteed to salvage your sex life, but every little bit helps and fashion has been known to make the man. For those of you who are stallions, you can get away with just about anything. Although, we'd suggest a nice pair of loose fitting tan khakis and a simple white shirt, preferably one that's form fitting or a bit snug. If you've got it,

Violinist returns to play Bezanson

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

Former Amherst resident, Matthew Hunter, the first North American to win a permanent position in the string section of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, will return to his hometown to perform in a recital at Bezanson Recital Hall on Sunday, Oct. 4 at 4 p.m.

Joining Hunter will be University of Massachusetts Department of Music & Dance Professors Estela Olevsky and Nigel Cove, both pianists. They will accompany Hunter in performances of works by Handoshkin, Kurtag, Berkeley and Franck.

Hunter has been a member of the Berlin Philharmonic since 1996, after leaving his position as assistant principal violinist in the National Arts Centre Orchestra in Ottawa, Canada to join the Philharmonic.

He first began his musical education with Elsa Brown, who is an Amherst resident and a Springfield Symphony violinist.

"I owe a very great debt to the musical community in Amherst with whom I grew up and especially to my late teacher Julian Olevsky," said Hunter. Hunter studied with Olevsky from the age of seven until he was thirteen.

After receiving a bachelor's degree in philosophy from Dartmouth College and studying with violinist Roman Totenberg at the Longy School of Music, Hunter returned to Amherst to study with Julian Olevsky and to receive a master's degree from the University of Massachusetts Music Department in 1983.

The son of Dr. & Mrs. Samuel Hunter, Hunter attended Amherst public schools including Marks Meadow Elementary and Amherst Regional Junior and Senior High Schools.

Upon his stay in Amherst, Hunter will also conduct and offer a master class devoted to the audition process.

While in the United States, he will be performing with the Berlin Philharmonic in New York City.

For more information regarding the master class, please call 545-0018. Tickets to the 4 p.m. performance are $10 for the general public, and $5 for students, elders, and children 18 and under. For ticket information, call 545-2511. The concert is a benefit for the Julian Olevsky Scholarship Fund.

New Hancock album

When you take two Miles Davis alums and team them together for a stripped down, no frills concert experience, good things are bound to happen.

Taking a break from the funk-filled, fusion heavy, 70's groove that they both helped orchestrate, Herbie Hancock and Chick Corea put together a stripped down acoustic piano tour back in 1978 which featured just the two of them on baby grands, getting back to basics. For the first time on CD in the U. S., Legacy has released a slice of this tour on the double disc, An Evening With Herbie Hancock And Chick Corea.

While this recording is a long listen, only six tracks but lasting about an hour and a half, it is never boring. Their performance takes many turns and explores various avenues of improvisation, showcasing the skills of two of jazz' most gifted pianists in their purest form.

Disc one is purely Chick Corea, and it is both intense and collected, as Corea performs a balancing act few others could sustain.

He opens with the standard, "Somedays My Prince Will Come," as a tribute to Miles Davis, beginning with a dream- like intro, wavering and wafting, then flowing into mischievous sounds like raindrops forming. The piano speaks hopefully, then drifts and seems to raise the stakes as the tempo picks up, and Corea shows his virtuosity.

A rendition of Gershwin's "Liza (All The Clouds'll Roll Away)" is more upbeat than the first track, and almost corny. It contains a very determined and pronounced main theme, off of which Corea goes nuts as he shows some hints of boogie-woogie piano, thunderous basslines (that also make the piece seem uptight at times), and an outstanding finish.

"Button Up," a Corea original, changes the pace of the first disk, closing it out solemnly as it almost cries out with internal conflict. It is a battle being waged, a constant building up, breaking down, rebuilding, tenuous piece of grandeur, operatic in nature.

The edgier second disc begins with Corea praising Herbie Hancock and noting his own excitement at the opportunity to hear Hancock play by himself.

Herbie opens with the icy "February Moment," going into the frosty depths of winter, then awakening to a certain finality, as if a resolution has been made. While this fifteen- minute track is pure tragedy in the beginning, it becomes an acceptance and seems to cope. As Hancock's playing gets funky and soulful, it also sounds a bit more hitting and practical, countering Corea's ghostly quality.

"Maiden Voyage," a Hancock staple, seems to urge the listener to voyage into the uncharted, the unexpected, the unknown. It holds a certain novelty like an exploration, or the promise of things to come — very jumpy and excitable, like a storm blowing then quiet by a calm, constantly and repeatedly in different ways.

The party comes to a close with Corea's "La Fiesta," a celebration of his maneuverability between musical forms and expressions. At times sounding like the narration of a bullfight, it contains every emotion — it is at times blissful and at peace, while at others completely instigated and infuriated, never posing as indifference.

This recording, as a whole, is everything you'd expect from two such giants as Hancock and Corea. As few musicians are able to do, these men make their instruments take on a persona — their pianos are an extension of themselves, with Hancock's speaking quickly and practically, and Corea's saying "take it easy, have a daydream."

flaunt it. Jeans are fine too, but not the ones with the butt hanging down to the ankles. Of course, there's no harm in showing a little bum, right ladies? Please, feel free to exploit yourself, but don't wear them too snug either (no need to cut off the circulation). Obviously, they shouldn't be ripped jeans, either.

For those of you who aren't Antonio Sabato, Jr. — shall we suggest something a little more fun? Let that wild side loose and add some flare to your wardrobe, with a pair of vinyl pants for instance. They'll turn more than a few heads and when you're feeling a tad generic they just scream, "Notice me!"

Try a funky hat, a Hawaiian shirt, a pair of plaid pants, a little something that separates you from the norm. Filenes also has a collection of clubbing shirts to die for. More importantly, they're very affordable, as in a cool $10. These things show that you're different and aren't afraid to show it, a definite turn on.

Well everyone, we hoped you've learned something, or at least were amused by our column. Have fun and be careful this weekend, now you know that at least you'll be well dressed!

Minutemen to host Vermont today

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's tennis team is set to conclude its brief two-game homestand with a match against the University of Vermont today at the Upper Boyden Courts.

The Minutemen (1-0) will put their undefeated record and their string of three consecutive victories (dating back to last year) over UVM on the line as they take on the 1-1 Catamounts. UMass has owned the matchup in the past few years, winning last year's two matches 6-1, and 7-0.

Massachusetts head coach Judy Dixon, however, admits that this year's match will be different.

"UVM has three new recruits that we have not seen," she said. "We have new players as well, though."

UMass has also made key additions this year with four transfer students and two freshmen. Despite the fact that these two schools played each other twice last year, these two current teams remain relatively unfamiliar to each other.

Last year the Minutemen fared very well against Vermont. Current UMass number one and two seeds Rob Manchester and Todd Cheney, and team captain Kevin Curley, all notched singles victories in the fall and in the spring to propel the team to two victories.

UVM is accustomed to playing in hostile territory. The first two matches of the season were both on the road, with a decisive win coming at New Hampshire to open the season and a tough loss the following week at Rhode Island.

Dixon is very wary that recent success against Vermont could prove to be a disadvantage.

"They want to beat us," Dixon said. "Their coach hates to lose to me. He will have them ready to play. I don't want [the team] to take UVM lightly."

Vermont will be playing with something to prove after their trouncing at URI.

"The doubles point will be key," said Dixon. "They are usually strong in doubles."

This year, however, the Catamounts have struggled, winning only two out of their six matches in doubles play. Dixon has vowed to iron out some of the problems in the UMass doubles lineup that were apparent in the match against the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

UMass junior Bo Navarro and sophomore Fabian Rabanal are coming off fine outings against MIT and look to continue their success today.

This match is a rare one for the Minutemen, with only four in the fall portion of their season. After this match, they head out on the road for three big road contests, then return home to face St. John's later this month.

Red Sox, Indians get set for battle in game three

BOSTON (AP) — The cooling-off period is over.

After splitting a pair of games in Cleveland, the Red Sox and Indians moved yesterday from a new stadium where tempers flared, to an old ballpark where tradition can fire up the most detached modern ballplayer.

"We won't have our fans behind us," said David Justice, whose three-run homer helped the Indians tie the series. "We're going to have to come in here and try to steal one or two. The atmosphere is great. This place will be rocking."

On Wednesday at Jacobs Field, Indians manager Mike Hargrove and pitcher Dwight Gooden were ejected in the first inning of Game 2. In the ninth, Boston third baseman John Valentin started toward the mound after a tight pitch from Mike Jackson.

Players didn't think there would be a carryover in Game 3 Friday.

"It's going to be a normal game; there's no room for mistakes," Cleveland catcher Sandy Alomar said.

The Indians did not want to leave home with two losses.

"It was basically a must-win game for us," said Charles Nagy, Cleveland's Game 3 starter. "To come here down 0-2 is pretty tough."

Especially since the game starts at 4:07 p.m. EDT. If it's sunny, there will be late-afternoon shadows that make it even harder to hit against a tough pitcher.

The story lines are numerous:

• Can Cleveland spoil Bret Saberhagen's remarkable comeback season?

• Will fans see the Mo Vaughn who drove in seven runs in Boston's 11-3 victory Tuesday, or will it be the Vaughn who went 1-for-4 with two strikeouts in Boston's 9-5 loss in Game 2?

• Can Nagy, 7-1 in his career against Boston, dominate the Red Sox once again?

• If Boston loses Game 3, will Red Sox manager Jimy Williams bring back Pedro Martinez on three days' rest instead of starting Pete Schourek in Game 4?

"If it was your son, and he has thrown 3,000-plus pitches and averaged 115 pitches a game, and his career is on the line, and you panicked and pitched him too soon and hurt him, I don't think you would be too happy," Williams said. "No, Pedro is not pitching Saturday."

That was good news to Schourek.

"Maybe they have the confidence in me and they're trying to protect him at the same time," Schourek said.

Saberhagen is proof of the fragility of pitchers' arms. He was MVP of the 1985 World Series as Kansas City beat St. Louis. Two Cy Young Awards later, his career was in jeopardy after shoulder surgery in May 1996.

He missed most of two seasons, then returned and beat Seattle's Randy Johnson in his first start this year. He went 15-8, one of the more remarkable comebacks of the '90s.

"I'm very close if not completely all the way back to where I wanted to be," Saberhagen said. "Contributing is nice, but contributing to a team that's in the postseason is what I was playing for."

Hargrove, a former first baseman with Cleveland, has dim memories of playing against Saberhagen.

"I remember not looking forward to facing him," the Indians manager said.

The sight of Nagy on the mound can't be one of the most pleasant for the Red Sox.

Water polo heads to 'Jersey for another big tournament

By Alexander Wood
Collegian Correspondent

While the summer has ended and the weather has begun to cool down, the Massachusetts men's water polo team continues to stay hot.

The Minutemen will take their 9-1 record into the North/South Challenge tournament this weekend in Princeton, New Jersey. UMass is coming off of a sweep in last week's CWPA league tournament in which they defeated Boston College, St. Francis and Brown.

This weekend's tournament will be a bit of a breather for the Minutemen because, unlike the last two weekends in which they played in CWPA league tournaments, this tournament is against non-league competition.

"It's a mid-season tournament and non-league games. But we're going in there to win," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth.

The Minutemen will be looking forward to the action, as it gives them a chance to get into a regulation size pool.

UMass has had to deal with plenty of adversity in and out of the pool this season, as their practice facilities at Western New England College and Amherst College have been unavailable for one reason or another this season.

Yarworth said, "Our facilities are limited and we've been unable to get into Amherst College [for practice] because of construction, so these games will be good to get into a regulation pool."

The Minutemen have been traveling to Springfield College once a week this season to practice and "overcome that stuff," according to Yarworth.

Despite these inconveniences, the team has thrived through the adversity to become a force.

"We are starting to play the kind of ball we are capable of," Yarworth said. "[In last weekend's tournament] We had four of our top players out with injuries, but we were still able to produce."

"St. Francis and Brown were ranked in the top 20 and we took close games at halftime and we basically blew them out in the second half," continued Yarworth. "So I was real happy with that."

This year's edition of the Minutemen has been blessed with a strong mix of players.

"We have a nice blend of seniors, middle classmen, and freshmen which gives us a nice balance of depth, talent, and enthusiasm," Yarworth said.

Freshmen Evan Lutz, Greg Traver, and Carlos Ramos combined with seniors Brian Stahl, Aldo Romani and junior Timmy Troupis give the Minutemen a solid mix of skill and depth that they'll be taking into action this weekend in the North/South Challenge.

Minutemen Notes: Players with two point goals: Ramos, Romani, Traver, and Slingluff each with one. ...Proof that you need to shoot the ball to score, the two leading scorers on the team are also the two with the most shots; Stahl (38 points) leads the team with 55 shots and 25 goals and second leading scorer Troupis (34 points) has 40 shots with 26 goals...Freshman Ramos is fourth on the team in points (17) and tied with Troupis for the second in assists (8 each)... Goalie Richard Huntley has two assists and ten steals...There are no scoreless players on the team, as every player on the team has at least one point.

Let the games begin

If the Massachusetts women's soccer team wants to host the Atlantic 10 conference title plaque again this season, it will need to get things going with a pair of wins this weekend versus Temple and St. Joe's.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Consider the odds before placing a bet or setting out over uncharted terrain today. Better safe than sorry!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You'll be content making efforts to please others today. Domestic activities bring you the most satisfaction, so do something to your home.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You'll gravitate toward those who share your feelings on a volatile and controversial issue today.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Now is no time to throw caution to the wind. Travel a conservative path and avoid unnecessary side-trips.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You'll be able to see through others when they depart from the truth today. You will be transparent as well.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — What seems accidental may be anything but. You might find you've been the target of a complex scheme!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Privacy is important today, but you must first settle a mounting conflict with a friend or loved one.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — A random approach is not for you today. Plan your moves with great care, thus minimizing the chance of an accident.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may have the time, money, and inclination to be extravagant as the day comes to a close. Do something special for someone.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Both the masculine and feminine in you will be readily apparent today. Enjoy this balance.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You're not likely to be as interested in the performance of your duties today as you are in the quiet study of your motives and methods.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Something you've planned for some time may seem less than promising now that it looms directly ahead of you.

A royal rumble at OSU; on to 'Dawgs at LSU

The Nittany Lions vs. the Buckeyes. While watching the game, some of you might ponder what separates a Nittany Lion from an average lion or what exactly a buckeye is; but beyond that, we have a great football game on hand here. You can't have everything, right?

These Big Ten games are what critics say help out other conferences out, come Bowl time. Two juggernauts, head-to- head: a loss and you can kiss the Bowl Championship Series good-bye, a win and you're still alive. Helmet to helmet on the quarterback, crossing patterns resulting in cornerback sticks... It's Big Ten football.

The site is Ohio Stadium, where Gary Cooper and his troops will try to defend their No. 1 ranking with a win versus Joe Paterno and Penn State. The winner could be standing alone atop the conference this weekend as the only other unbeatens, Wisconsin and Minnesota, will be tested on the road by Indiana and Purdue, respectively.

Penn State could not have had much relaxation, after tiptoeing out of Pittsburgh with a 20-13 victory, a win where the offensive line allowed eight sacks. And that was Pittsburgh. We're talking Ohio State here, the same team who is ranked ninth in the nation in total defense.

The Nittany Lions have trouble moving the ball. Quarterback Kevin Thompson has had only two touchdown passes in three games. He will certainly be tested by Cooper, with different looks and frequent blitzes. The entire secondary returns from last year's squad which helped defeat Toledo with five interceptions.

Ah, yes, and that offense, the offense that has actually outdone their counterparts. After losing Pepe Pearson to graduation, running back Michael Wiley has fit in quite nicely, currently ranked sixth in the nation after having rushed for 500 yards on only 54 carries.

Penn State must make Joe Germaine beat them, if they had other options, they would choose another way to get beaten, but they don't. Germaine has become one of the most steady and consistent leaders in all college football this year.

Without Stanley Jackson on his tail, Germaine has put up modest numbers, throwing for five touchdowns and zero interceptions. He will give Cooper exactly what he needs: not to be scores. Not a 400-yard passing day. Instead, he will get the first down or the heady play.

If Penn State is going to have a chance, they need to go full-tilt on defense. A high scoring affair only fuels Ohio State. The Nittany Lions do not have the tools on offense to stay with the Buckeyes. The freight train is chugging forward and someone has to knock out the engineer and pull this runaway to a screeching halt. Someone has to make the big play as momentum is priceless in a game like this one.

"Scary" is the word critics are using to describe Ohio State in this one. "Scary." The Buckeyes are favored by 14 points in their own place. Don't expect that. Oh no...expect more than that. Ohio State 33, Penn State 10.

Mauser's Toilet Bowl Picks of the Week:

Last week: 1-2

Season: 4-2

Dissecting statistics for this week's Georgia/LSU showdown in the Bayou was simple, so I thought. Kevin Faulk, Quincy Carter, the SEC, you're done. But then there's the Tigers' special teams.

Placekicker Danny Boyd doesn't have any field goals, which would not seem like that big of a deal with LSU's stacked offense. In three games, though, Boyd has missed five extra point attempts and forced the Tigers to go for two in sticky situations.

It would be a shame for this pup to go down in the books as an LSU loss by virtue of a missed chippie, and it probably won't, but the Curse of Boyd in a championship– like season could bite any time soon.

Georgia will likely give up more points tomorrow than they have in the first three games of the season, of which they have yielded only 15 total. The offense was the question for the 'Dawgs, after graduating QB Mike Bobo, Hines Ward, and current Patriot Robert Edwards. Freshman Carter, though, won the four-man battle for the quarterback spot and has led them to a perfect record through three rounds.

In LSU's place, I'll take Georgia with 8 1/2 from the get- go. Faulk's a keeper, as is Tiger O Herb Tyler, but I just can't stray from that "defense wins championships" bit.

• On the undercard, give me Baylor and 12 1/2 points on the road against Texas Tech and Michigan, giving nine, when they go to Iowa City to square off with the Hawkeyes.

UMass looks for win No. 3 vs. Hofstra

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Hofstra's football history with Massachusetts goes back one year, to a single game. That series will be doubled this Saturday, as UMass travels to Long Island to face the Flying Dutchmen.

All that Hofstra remembers about the Minutemen is that the game was a rout. The Dutchmen threw for 404 yards and intercepted UMass quarterbacks five times for a score of 51-13.

Incidentally, Massachusetts is still susceptible to the air attack, as Buffalo signal caller Chad Salisbury recorded 375 yards and two touchdowns a week ago. However, the Minutemen are no longer defeatable by the pass alone, as they pummeled the Bulls in that game, 51-27, despite the high output by Salisbury.

The Flying Dutchmen shouldn't expect to pick off five passes again this year, either, as UMass junior transfer quarterback Todd Bankhead has thrown only one in three games so far this season. On the flipside, Bankhead has tossed 10 touchdowns in a season during which, in the first three weeks, the Minutemen have already equalled their win total of last year: two games.

Hofstra will come into the game riding high, despite the Maroon and White's change of fortune, though, as they boast a 3-0 mark on the season, giving them the No. 5 ranking in the nation among Division I-AA teams. The Dutchmen have reached the end zone on the ground and through the air, averaging more than 200 yards in each of their three games.

Leading the attack for the Flying Dutchmen will be quarterback Giovanni Carmazzi, with 578 yards and four touchdowns on the year, and the two-headed monster tailback duo of Vaughn Sanders and Jimmy Jones, who have totalled 496 yards and six touchdowns rushing between them. Bankhead was on his way to Hofstra, but then it was made apparent that he would not see much time under center with Carmazzi around.

"It should be a fast track," Whipple said. "They have some athletes. I think we have some athletes. It should be a lot of fun and a very competitive game. We're just gonna do our best to try to one more point than Hofstra on Saturday."

Aside from Bankhead's productivity, UMass will ride running back Marcel Shipp into Long Island. Shipp's 221 yards a week ago gives him a total 393 on the season.

"He's a great kid and a tough, tough competitor. He's had another great week of practice," Whipple said. "I don't know if he'll get 220 this week, but I think that you're going to see him make some people miss and make some big plays down at Hofstra."

Returning to the lineup will be freshman speedster Adrian Zullo, who will join a talented group of receivers that includes Jimmy Moore and All-American candidate Kerry Taylor.

Hofstra, with their hefty point production average, will be on the field with a UMass defense that gives up almost 26 points each time out. Bankhead and company, however, will do battle with a defense led by linebacker James Emanuel, who has tallied 24 tackles, one sack, and two interceptions.

The Flying Dutchmen have taken the ball away from opponents 11 times, while turning it over only once.

Freshman defensive back Jeremy Robinson has quickly made a name for himself by pulling down two key interceptions a game ago, earning the honor of Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week.

"The thing that I'm excited about is our defense, which I think is getting better and better and better. You can see it everyday," Whipple said. "We're young back there. I think they are rapidly improving and they're the ones that are going to keep us in the game."

Linebacker Khari Samuel has forced a team high four fumbles, but his services might not be made available on the trip to Long Island. He has not practiced this week and remains at 50-50 for this weekend.

"We're going to miss Khari," Whipple said. "He's our best player and if he can't go then, hey, we're going to make the best of it. Our other guys have to step up."

The Minutemen will look to overcome the odds and return to Amherst for next weekend's clash with James Madison. A win over the Flying Dutchmen could vault UMass into the Top 25.

Minutewomen host Temple and St. Joe's

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

For all intensive purposes, the season begins today for the Massachusetts women's soccer team.

After struggling through a fierce non-conference schedule, the 5-6 Minutewomen will begin the quest for their sixth consecutive regular season title with a pair of weekend matches versus Temple and St. Joseph's.

It will be crucial for UMass to get off on the right foot with a pair of wins this weekend. The reality is that the only way for the Minutewomen to gain a berth into the NCAA tournament will be through winning the Atlantic 10 tournament title. Therefore, UMass is going to need to make sure it secures a place in the A-10 tournament, which gets underway on Nov. 6 in Dayton, Ohio.

"Both of these teams are off to good starts. St. Joe's is off to their best start ever," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We're going to take it one game at a time."

In the past, you could have easily chalked these games up as victories for UMass, but that's not the case this season. The conference as a whole has improved, and these two squads that will visit Amherst are testaments to that fact.

The Owls (5-4, 0-1 in the A-10) are coming into today's 3:30 p.m. matchup on the heels of a tough 1-0 loss to St. Joe's on Monday. They will be led by Katie Mills, who leads the team in goals (six) and points (13). Complementing Mills offensively will be Mary Mulvenna, who already has three goals and three assists on the year.

"Temple is a team that has got our attention. They finally have a team that won't have to sit back, bunker in and play a lot of defense," Rudy said. "Mills is a transfer from ODU (Old Dominion) who is small, quick, and dangerous. Mulvenna also has good speed and is a good attacking midfielder."

Others who the Minutewomen will have to look out for include Brandi Wright, Lori Brennan and goalkeeper Winsome Fritz.

As an aside, it is also noteworthy that Temple is the only team to defeat UMass in A-10 regular season play. The Owls defeated the Minutewomen back in 1995, and are the only blemish on UMass' regular season record of 29-1-3 since the inception of the conference back in 1993.

St. Joe's (6-2-1, 1-0 in the A-10) will then come to Totman Field for a 1 p.m. affair on Sunday. The Hawks will be led by sophomore Lisa Benvenuto and 1st-team All- Atlantic 10 pick Ellen-Carine Stenrud. Benvenuto already has 17 points this season for St. Joe's, while Stenrud has added 10.

"Stenrud is a very gifted player who always wants the ball, and Benvenuto is a kid who we wanted here badly. She has great speed and fighting power," Rudy said. "Sweeper Mindy Spellman is also a very skillful player."

The Minutewomen enter the weekend coming off a 4-1 win over Texas on Sunday. Senior co-captain Sophie Lecot, sophomore Kara Grunwald and junior Emma Kurowski, the team's three leading scorers, will play an integral role in the success of the team in this couplet.

Defensively, Rudy announced junior transfer Susannah Nord will start on defense Friday, and junior keeper Angie Napoli will be back in the net versus the Owls.

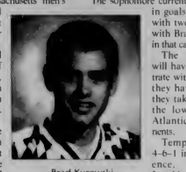
Men's soccer to face off vs. St. Joe's and Temple

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

After an encouraging performance last weekend, the Massachusetts' men's soccer team will attempt to get their first two wins of the year this weekend.



The Minutemen will travel to the City of Brotherly Love, Philadelphia, in search of some satisfaction against Temple and St. Joseph's.

These conference matches will come on the heels of last Saturday's 1-1 tie against Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island.

One disturbing factor the Minutemen must overcome is the loss of sophomore forward Seth Lilburn against URI due to a fractured left foot.

Lilburn hurt himself after a gut-wrenching effort against the Rams at Totman Field. He collided with several URI players at various points of the game, and eventually his reckless abandon caught up with him.

It appears likely that Lilburn's highly regarded services will be lost for the remainder of the year. Thus far during his stay at UMass, Lilburn has contributed six goals and eight assists in 27 games.

Brad Kurowski

The sophomore currently ranks first in goals this season with two. He is tied with Brad Kurowski in that category.

The Minutemen will have to concentrate with the players they have active as they take on two of the lower echelon Atlantic 10 opponents.

Temple finished 4-6-1 in the conference, while St. Joseph's placed last at 1-9-1 last year.

Last year, UMass came up with two victories over these opponents in convincing fashion. The Minutemen trounced then No. 19 Temple 4-0, marking the first career shutout for goaltender Todd Fowler. UMass then defeated St. Joseph's by a tally of 3-1 backed by their three second half goals.

This year, Temple has started off at 1-6-1 overall, but they did win their initial Atlantic 10 game against St. Joseph's 2-1 in overtime.

UMass will have to defend against the Owls' two star players in Kevin Kelly and Ryan Haney. Both players have five points thus far to tie as the team's scoring leaders.

On the defensive end, Temple will have Phil Pizzano in net. Pizzano has saved 68 shots in the eight games he has started this season.

On the St. Joe's side of things, the Hawks will enter the weekend with a 2-7 mark with their wins coming against Maryland-Baltimore County and Philadelphia Textile.

Leading the way for St. Joe's will be freshman forward Roman Escobar, who leads the team in goals (three) and points (seven). Other offensive threats include Aleksander Peev and Rob Smith, each of whom have two goals on the season.

Right now the Minutemen who are at 0-6-2, cannot afford to overlook anybody right now, especially on the road.

The road will become quite a familiar place for the squad as they will head out for another series next weekend against George Washington and Virginia Tech.

UMass will take it one weekend at a time for now, as they look to regain their momentum heading into the bulk of their schedule.

Minutewomen spikers hit the road for two against GW and Fordham

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's volleyball team takes their 5- 8 record back on the road to face George Washington and Fordham this weekend.

The Minutewomen head into these Atlantic 10 matches at 2-2 in the conference and are hoping to take two wins away from the Colonials and Rams.

The Minutewomen hit the court tonight against GW. UMass will have to continue to put the pressure on their opponents in order to come out on top.

"Both matches for us are crucial. We must also be creative with our sets. They're a big team," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said.

The Colonials enter their match with UMass, 8-4, 3-1 in the A-10. This is a critical match on the road for UMass. Their big hitters must terminate in order for the Minutewomen attack to be effective.

The most crucial point for UMass, however, may be how freshman setter Heather Holtsberg does. Holtsberg must be creative with her sets in order for UMass hitters Kari Hogancamp, Jill Meyers and Janeen DeMarte to be able to survive over the bigger Colonials.

"We must do a good job setting because it will be difficult to run the middle against GW. We must create different ways to score," Kenny said.

UMass must watch for A-10 rookie of the week Gabriela Mojska. Mojska tallied 22 kills and 20 digs in a pair of matches last weekend. The Minutewomen must also watch for Tihana Sarlija, who leads the Colonials in kills with 124, and has also played well defensively with 55 digs.

The Minutewomen will also take on the Fordham Rams in New York on Saturday evening. The Rams enter the match with a 5-6 overall record and a dismal 1-3 A-10 record. The Minutewomen need to keep their recent groove going to beat the Rams.

"We will need to stay on them from the get go. Fordham is an improving team that if we don't stay with their changes it could be trouble," Kenny said.

The Rams are coming off their final non-conference game which was a 3-1 loss to St. Peter's. The Rams have also dropped some tough games to some weak opponents thus far this season. This is an A-10 game which the Minutewomen need to take advantage of.

"What we need to do against the Rams is stay patient on our sets and hits. We must also adjust to the tempo and their timing because they run a 4-2, which means they have two setters, so this is something we will need to adjust to," Kenny said.

The Minutewomen bring the noise with the usual cast of characters. Holtsberg will be vital for the win this weekend for UMass. The Illinois native must come up with a variation of sets to confuse the Colonials as well as the Rams. The freshman has 281 assists thus far this season, an astounding number considering she has only started half the matches for UMass.

Another key for the Minutewomen will be their outside hitting. Hogancamp will try to bring the double-double streak to four consecutive matches this weekend. She has already tallied 160 kills, 203 digs and 15 service aces.

Meyers will be clutch in the middle. The junior co-captain has also amassed 174 kills, which leads the team, and 118 digs.

The major piece of the puzzle for the Minutewomen will be DeMarte. She will be counted on heavily as one of the outside threats this weekend. Her play, along with the play of fellow freshman Lauren Vander Veen, could spell a successful outcome for UMass.

Politicians protected after Friday's slaying

ULAN BATOR,(AP) Mongolia— Police placed a leading democratic politician under protection yesterday following the grisly killing of a popular government minister seen as a compromise candidate to end Mongolia's protracted political crisis.

Friday's slaying of Infrastructure Minister Sanjaasuregiin Zorig shocked the capital, Ulan Bator, which has been locked in a four-month standoff between the governing Democratic Coalition and a resurgent opposition composed largely of former communists. About 4,000 people turned out in near-freezing temperatures for the second night in a row Sunday on the square outside Government House. Buddhist monks chanted prayers over a loudspeaker, and mourners placed lit candles in Zorig's memory on the parliament's wall and walked around the square three times as is the tradition for holy processions.

Although police have not released a motive for Zorig's death, people at the first vigil Saturday night called it a political killing.

Crowd besieges Van Gogh show

WASHINGTON (AP)— Thousands of art lovers braved dank weather yesterday to view the brilliant color and vibrant emotion of Vincent van Gogh's paintings as the largest van Gogh exhibit in the United States in 25 years opened.

"I'm interested in the arts," said Ryan Downs, explaining why he had waited outside the National Gallery of Art since 1 a.m. to get a free pass for the 72-painting show.

Downs, a 33-year-old engineer from Fairfax, Va., led a procession of about 600 people into the museum when it opened at 11 a.m., and more than 4,000 people paraded past the paintings throughout the day.

The gallery is offering about 2,000 free passes for admission at specific times on a first-come, first-serve basis each day. Long lines are expected around the government-owned museum's West Building each day of the exhibit, which runs through Jan. 3. In less than two weeks after advance passes became available this summer, van Gogh fans quickly had snapped up 196,908, either waiting outside the museum or paying a small fee to a ticket agency. By Sept. 11, they all were gone.

UM student dies in crash

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

A third University of Massachusetts student in a three-week span died Saturday night, as a result of a car accident in Athol.

Deidre A. Didion, 17, of Methuen, died Oct. 3. Didion was a UMass freshman undeclared major living in Pierpont Residence Hall.

Three of her friends also died in the crash. Two were Methuen High School seniors; the third was a resident of Salem, NH.

At 5:15 p.m. Saturday evening, Didion and her three friends were heading westbound on Route 2, apparently on their way to UMass. Their 1989 Nissan Pulsar swerved into the eastbound lane and collided with a 1988 Ford truck, driven by Douglas Gordon, 35, of Orange.

In an Associated Press article, police said the car was speeding and weaving in and out of traffic in order to pass other cars when it hit the oncoming truck.

Both vehicles were engulfed in flames and burned upon the arrival of police, according to State Trooper Robert Benoit.

All four passengers of the Nissan were pronounced dead at the scene. Police were unable to determine the driver of the car.

Douglas, the driver of the one-ton truck, was taken to Athol Memorial Hospital and released, having suffered no injuries.

At the time of the collision, which is under investigation, the weather was fair, the road was dry and the traffic was medium to heavy, Benoit said.

Alcohol or drugs do not appear to have been a contributing factor; however, the car's speed may have been a cause, police said.

"The University feels terrible about this tragic accident. It's really devastating for students, staff and faculty," said Kay Scanlon of the UMass News Office.

The University is concerned about student reaction to the most recent in a string of UMass student deaths.

Officials are quick to dispell rumors that all four women were UMass students. Talk of the tragedy travelled throughout campus yesterday.

Chaplains and other counseling resources are available through the Dean of Students Office in Whitmore, and can be reached at 545-2684.

Plans for a memorial service have not been announced as of yet.

Puerto Ricans homeless after Georges

By Steven Gutkin
Associated Press

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — At a shelter in Puerto Rico last week, Hillary Rodham Clinton spoke of a $39 million dollar U.S. grant to rebuild hurricane-ravaged homes.

But two weeks after Hurricane Georges pummeled this U.S. territory, thousands still languish in schools, community centers and the homes of family and friends — and her pledge looks like a drop in the bucket.

The cost of getting the homeless into homes will be far greater than virtually anyone had imagined, probably well beyond $1 billion. And U.S. taxpayers are sure to foot most of the bill. "We're talking megabucks," said Michael Colon, the Caribbean coordinator for the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Officials originally estimated overall property damage to the island — including roads, public buildings, parks, beaches — at $2 billion, a figure now believed to be underestimated.

So far, the effort to solve the homeless crisis has been accompanied by confusion. Officials still don't know how many homeless there are — or how to give them homes.

Aside from killing three people on the island, Georges destroyed nearly 30,000 houses and damaged at least another 60,000, the local Housing Department estimates. Those left homeless can receive up to $25,000 from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, as well as $13,500 to buy new appliances and furniture.

Puerto Rico authorities now say the FEMA program, which would allow residents to rebuild their wood and zinc homes, may be ill-advised because it will leave new homes as vulnerable to hurricanes as the old ones.

Gov. Pedro Rosello instead wants federal block grants that, combined with money from Puerto Rico's local budget, would subsidize more expensive cement homes located out of harm's way. Under his plan, hurricane victims would purchase houses worth $65,000 for $15,000, with mortgage payments of about $100 per month.

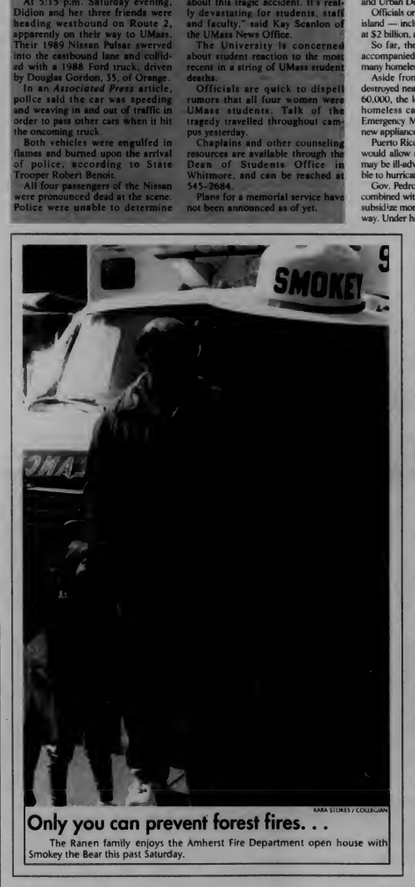
"Even though this has been a disaster for Puerto Rico, we should look at this as an opportunity to build something better than what we had before," explained Puerto Rico's Housing Secretary, Ana Carmen Alemany.

The plan was presented to Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo when he arrived in Puerto Rico last week with Mrs. Clinton.

"We are banking on having Secretary Cuomo going back to President Clinton and (FEMA director) James Lee Witt and expressing to them support for this program," Alemany said.

In the meantime, 15,000 Puerto Rican hurricane victims remain holed up in shelters. More are staying with friends and relatives, though no one known exactly how many.

Concrete decisions on solving their longterm plight have taken a back seat to the immediate need to restore water and electricity and provide temporary shelter.



"As of now, there is no program yet," admitted Bessie Figueroa, the Puerto Rico Housing Department's liaison to FEMA. Meanwhile, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is crisscrossing the island to replace damaged roofs. The island's Housing Department is providing $1,000 vouchers to purchase building materials. The city of San Juan is handing out $500 checks for groceries.

"We can't wait for the federal government," said San Juan Mayor Sila Calderon.

At a San Juan shelter last week, Calderon was handing out clothes and checks to hurricane victims when four gunshots rang out.

"Don't panic!" social workers yelled as frightened residents scrambled to their cots.

The sound of guns isn't unusual in this neighborhood of western San Juan, notorious for its gang activity, but the shelter inhabitants were especially on edge after losing their homes and their privacy to Georges.

Secretary to Delaware governor becomes the center of a mystery

By Todd Spangler
Associated Press

WILMINGTON, Del. — Anne Marie Fahey was so neat she folded dirty laundry. Her bed was always made — sometimes she put a mint on her own pillow.

That's why the scene at her apartment made no sense: groceries left out, shoe boxes scattered across the floor. The bedspread was pulled back, but the sheets were unwrinkled.

The 30-year-old scheduling secretary to Delaware's governor was missing.

Her family helped search a nearby park, circulated flyers and erected a billboard pleading for information. President Clinton called a distraught Gov. Thomas Carper, offering the FBI's assistance.

Fahey had last been seen June 27, 1996, dining at a Philadelphia restaurant with Thomas Capano, a handsome, 48-year-old former deputy attorney general from one of the wealthiest, most powerful families in Wilmington. The two had been having a three-year secret affair, which Fahey was seeking to end, friends told police.

"I finally brought closure to Tom Capano," Fahey wrote in her diary in April, her last entry. "What a controlling, manipulative, insecure, jealous maniac."

A jury will decide if Capano is a murderer, too.

Jury selection for Capano's trial on charges he killed Fahey is scheduled to begin Tuesday and is expected to take several weeks. In the trial, expected to last two months, prosecutors will present a mountain of circumstantial evidence, including blood stains in Capano's house which the FBI said were almost certainly Fahey's.

The most damaging evidence will be testimony from another Capano mistress, who says she gave him a gun, and from his brother Gerard, who says he helped Capano dump a body off the New Jersey coast. A prison informant told prosecutors Capano talked about arranging to murder the two witnesses against him.

But even the judge has pointed out the weaknesses of the state's case.

"The state has produced no weapon, no body, no eyewitnesses to the alleged crime," Superior Court Judge William Swain Lee said in a February hearing at which he nevertheless denied bail for Capano. Investigators have pieced together a picture of a tumultuous relationship. Fahey accepted Capano's attention and gifts — airline tickets, a television, clothes — but wouldn't consider a life with him, even after he separated from his wife.

Her friends said Capano was obsessed, calling her incessantly and loitering outside her apartment. Once he climbed her fire escape to take back his gifts, a Fahey friend told police. Still, Fahey continued dining with Capano and exchanging playful e-mails with him.

At the time of her disappearance, even her friends believed the relationship had settled into a stable friendship.

Capano has maintained he took Fahey home after their dinner and never saw her again.

Capano was considered a suspect early in the case, but it took prosecutors 17 months to get what they needed to arrest him: testimony from Capano's own brothers.

Faced with possible drug and weapons charges after a raid on his home, Gerard Capano, Thomas' younger brother, told authorities a gruesome tale.

Gerard said Thomas came to his home the morning after his dinner with Fahey and asked to use Gerard's boat in Stone Harbor, N.J., to dispose of a body. They took the boat about 70 miles offshore and tossed a large cooler overboard.

It floated.

Gerard Capano said he fired a deer slug from a 12-gauge shotgun into it. Blood seeped out, he said, but the cooler did not sink. Gerard Capano said he handed Thomas an anchor, turned his back and told him he was on his own.

Turning back around, "I saw a foot sinking into the deep," Gerard Capano testified at his brother's bail hearing.

Gerrard also said he helped Thomas put a bloodstained sofa into a trash bin at one of the family's construction sites. A second brother, Louis Jr., a millionaire developer, said Thomas told him he threw a gun in the trash bin.

Searches of landfills uncovered no sofa or gun. A Navy search never found a body.

Defense lawyers are quick to note that Capano's brothers talked to prosecutors when both were threatened with federal charges. Louis Capano reached a deal on a witness tampering charge; Gerard, for hiding the commission of a felony.

But investigators found evidence that appeared to corroborate Gerard's story, including a cooler with a bullet hole through it that a fisherman found floating.

A longtime Capano mistress, Deborah MacIntyre, told prosecutors this winter that she bought a gun in May 1996 and gave it to Capano. Acting as a government witness, MacIntyre taped Capano's phone calls from prison in which he accused her of betraying him. A judge said the tapes cannot be used at trial. But prosecutors may be able to use testimony from a prison witness who said Capano talked about arranging the murders of Gerard Capano and MacIntyre.

Hispanamerica conference held

By Heather Lei Guzzetta

Martin Gomez, Executive Director of the Brooklyn Public Library, spoke at the Hispamerica Conference last Saturday about his life, his job and the challenges that Latinos face in the world today.

Gomez related his experiences growing up with "one foot in one world and the other in another." He said that he is proud to be Latino and learned his strong values from his roots as a second generation Mexican.

Statistics show that by the year 2010, Latinos will be the largest minority in the United States. Gomez said that Latinos must use their numbers to bring about changes in education, political empowerment and economic development.

He said that there is a crisis in public education due to the high rate of Latino high school drop outs, the tax on bilingual education and segregation of the rich parts of towns from the poor ones.

Over the years, Latino children have shown the least improvement in academics, according to Gomez. He believes this to be partially due to the fact that most Latinos live in poorer neighborhoods whose schools do not receive as much attention and financial aid as those in wealthier neighborhoods.

In the area of political empowerment, Gomez said that Latinos must produce officials to address the needs of the Latino community. He said that there must be more support for Latino candidates from the community.

He believes that public policy needs to be made to create opportunities for Latinos.

KARA STOKES / COLLEGIAN

Martin Gomez

Gomez urged the audience to harness the strength of their numbers to bring about these changes.

"We must all take responsibility for leadership," Gomez said.

Gomez was born in Chicago to migrant farm workers. The first of seven children to go to college, he learned who he was when he moved to Los Angeles.

While he was there he encountered an entirely different culture. He said that the border communities are more discriminatory than most other places he has been.

Gomez received the opportunity to go to the University of California, Los Angeles when a program called Upward Bound pulled him from a local community college.

He would like to see other Latinos have the same opportunities that he has received. He said that he is proud to be a Mexican working in a profession where there are few Latinos.

Gomez stated that his job is in part to go out and persuade the politicians and the rich patrons to support the institution both politically and financially.

Starving baby abducted; security camera catches dad

By Kristen Moulton
Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — The mother of a man who allegedly kidnapped his malnourished child from a hospital appealed yesterday for him and his wife to surrender before their dangerous ideas about nutrition kill the 20-month-old boy.

Cheryl Gardner worried for the safety of the little boy as temperatures dipped below freezing and snow started to fall in Utah's mountains, where Christopher and Kyndra Fink are believed to have taken their boy last month.

"It's too cold to have that baby out there. He's so hungry," Gardner said at a press conference organized by the FBI.

A security camera showed Fink taking the boy, David, from Primary Children's Medical Center on Sept. 19, five days after Mrs. Fink's family admitted she severely malnourished child.

He weighed 16 pounds, which is about the size of an average 6-month-old, and had been fed only watermelon and lettuce according to a diet his father believed would allow the boy to live forever.

The last confirmed sighting of the family was about 50 miles southeast of Salt Lake on Sept. 25.

Family members have told authorities that Fink, 23, is a skilled survivalist who is capable of living in the wilderness for extended periods.

Mrs. Fink, 23, was due to give birth to their second child in the past few days, the FBI said.

Gardner and her husband, Rickie, are roving ministers from Altoona, Pa., whom the FBI located Friday in Colorado.

She said she has not spoken with her son and daughter-in-law since May 1997, and cannot fathom what would have led them to starve their child. Gardner said that while she and her husband follow a vegetarian diet, they

SGA pleased with voter turnout

By Julie Fialkow

On Friday afternoon, the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association announced the official results of the Senate and Area Government Elections, held Monday, September 28.

In order for the results of the elections to be official, Chancellor of Elections Seth Presser must write up an elections report after recounting the ballots and making sure all election procedures were followed.

SGA has not taken a count of the total number of students who voted in the election.

Presser said SGA knew they had surpassed the approximately 900 votes needed to ratify the elections, from the total number of students who voted on the referendum questions. Presser added that it is erroneous to assume that the 1,743 students who voted on the two referendum questions, also voted for the senate or area government races.

Jodi Bailey, associate speaker of the senate, said the elections went well.

"I'm really glad we got 5% [the amount needed to ratify elections]," she said. "I wish more students came out. We're going to try and make sure more students know what SGA is doing and how they can get involved."

Bailey attributes the ratification of elections this year, as opposed to last year's nullified senate/area government race, to increased advertising.

"We chop-chopped [handed out flyers], postered, went to dorms, and were available for [residential] programs," Bailey said. "If we hadn't stood outside the dining commons the day of elections, people wouldn't have voted."

At the first senate meeting this Wednesday, there will be a training session to help new senators become familiar with their new position.

Bailey said she hopes these new senators will help change the face of SGA.

"I hope we advocate more for students this year," Bailey said, "and that internal bickering and squabbling does not reoccur."

According to the elections report, the approximate percentage of students in each residential area who voted on the senate races are: Southwest– six percent, Orchard Hill— 17.5 percent, Central— five percent, Northeast— six percent, Sylvan— 14 percent, and Commuter—one percent.

Global economic outlook has worsened according to the IMF

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The policy-setting committee for the International Monetary Fund said yesterday that the global economic outlook has "worsened considerably," but ended a day of discussions on the subject by papering over disagreements on how to halt the widening financial crisis.

The IMF's interim committee pledged "concrete and rapid action" to deal with the worst global economic crisis in 50 years but used vague language indicating substantial disagreement still exists.

Citing deepening recessions in Japan and many Asian nations, the collapse of the Russian ruble and stock market turmoil around the world, the IMF panel said, "The outlook for the world economy has worsened considerably since the committee's April meeting."

The United States and a number of other nations in recent weeks have put forward major proposals to overhaul the operations of the IMF, which has been widely criticized for bungling the way it has handled the Asian crisis.

However, the final IMF statement underscored how much disagreement remains over just what approach should be taken. None of the major measures were adopted, although the group pledged to continue working toward agreement on a coordinated strategy.

"Now is the time to follow up with concrete and rapid action," the IMF statement said, although it indicated many of the proposals would not be acted on until next spring.

The disagreements between nations on the IMF panel reflected the differences that surfaced in discussions Saturday among the finance ministers and central bank presidents of the world's seven wealthiest countries.

Despite a major Clinton administration effort to project unity among economic powers at these meetings, there is still strong disagreement over the proper course to follow. The weekend discussions represented the start of the annual meetings of the 182-nation IMF and its sister lending organization, the World Bank. U.S. officials insisted that they were happy with the initial support they have received for a major initiative Clinton unveiled Friday that would accelerate emergency IMF loans to countries threatened with investor panic.

In its statement, the IMF committee said it would "explore" such an approach but stressed that nothing could be done without the United States and other major members replenishing the IMF's depleted resources.

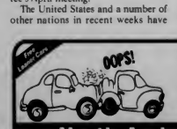
Several nations, including Britain and Japan, had said earlier in the day that agreement of the U.S. initiative depended heavily on whether the U.S. Congress ends its delay and approves an $18 billion American contribution before its scheduled adjournment later this week.

The final IMF statement did prod Japan, as the world's second largest economy, toward moving much more quickly to jump-start its economy and deal with an estimated $1 trillion in debt weighing down its banking sector.

It also criticized Russia for defaulting on billions of dollars in foreign loans in August - an action that shocked markets around the world - and urged the government of Boris Yeltsin to take "immediate measures to re-establish confidence in the ruble" and resume payments to foreigners holding Russian debt.

Despite the policy disputes at the IMF, the United States pushed ahead yesterday with efforts to assemble a multibillion-dollar bailout plan for Brazil, the latest country threatened by panicked investors seeking to pull out their money.

It was expected that perhaps a $30 billion emergency credit line for Brazil could be announced as soon as today if final results are known by then in that country's presidential election. Incumbent Fernando Henrique Cardoso was projected as the winner by exit polls.



But on proper policies to pursue in their own countries, the major economic powers showed less agreement.

British and German monetary officials resisted pressures to follow the lead of the U.S. Federal Reserve in cutting interest rates to spur growth and make sure that a slowdown in Europe doesn't add further drag on an already weakened global economy.

More than $100 billion in IMF bailout packages have been put together since the start of the Asian crisis. They provided help only after a country's economy was decimated and its resources depleted by investors seeking to flee. Under the Clinton proposal, the IMF would offer credit earlier in hopes of averting a disastrous flight of capital.

The currency crises started in Thailand 15 months ago, then struck Indonesia and South Korea. In August, similar conditions triggered a free fall of the Russian economy, and that in turn raised anxieties that Latin America will be next.

He said that in the next century there will be a major societal transformation shaped by digital information and computers. By the year 2000, computers will be found in 50 percent of American households and 20 percent of personal financial transactions will be addressed electronically. He would like to see public access to computers and the Internet put in libraries so that those who do not have the personal resources to provide access for themselves are not left behind.

After Gomez's speech the conference broke up into different panels and workshops that covered topics such as Hispanics and education, business information for Hispanics, identity and politics and the Internet.

Celebs in the news

FRANKFURT, Germany (AP) — A day after Claudia Schiffer told a Rome newspaper she was through with fashion shows, the supermodel said she was misunderstood.

"I'm not quitting," Schiffer said in a statement issued Sunday. The 28-year-old said she meant only that she wouldn't work the runways anymore at shows in Milan.

"For me, the runway work was only a small part of my modeling career, and more important at the beginning to become known internationally," she said. But "for almost two years now I've only done fashion shows occasionally and for special causes, for example, for Valentino."

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Christopher Reeve told a 6-year-old girl paralyzed in an amusement park accident that thanks to advances in spinal cord research she might walk again someday.

Reeve, who was paralyzed in a 1995 equestrian accident, on Saturday attended a fund-raiser for Emily's Walk for Spinal Research, a foundation Emily Hunt's parents founded in her name. Reeve told the girl and audience members that research involving rats offers hope that spinal cord injuries can be mended. The only barrier to human testing is money, Reeve said.

"I just want you to know that what we're talking about now is simply the financing of the procedure," he said. "It's going to happen."

Emily suffercd a spinal cord injury and her grandmother was killed in August 1996 when an amusement park train derailed and wrecked.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — Back where he comes from, two former supporters of singer Kenny Chesney are suing him for half a million dollars.

John Staley and Bob Thomas say that in 1992 Chesney signed a contract assigning 20 percent of his income to their firm, Paradise Management. They say Chesney breached his contract.

Despite the lawsuit seeking $500,000, the opposing parties are negotiating a possible settlement, according to Bridget Bailey, a spokeswoman for Staley and Thomas. Chesney representatives didn't return phone calls over the weekend.

Chesney, named top new male vocalist this year by the Academy of Country Music, grew up in Luttrell, about 20 miles from Knoxville. Chesney's tunes include "Back Where I Come From," "When I Close My Eyes" and "She's Got it All."

SAN DIEGO (AP) — Bob Dole thinks President Clinton's sex scandal could help put a woman in the White House.

In town for a symposium, Dole said the nation will have a female president or vice president "very soon."

"I think all this scandal helps, too," Dole said. "I think people are looking at women for integrity and leadership." His first choice for the job is his wife, Elizabeth.

"In fact I even bought six caps — I didn't want too big an inventory — they say, 'Elizabeth 2000,'" Dole said, adding that he has three left.

The longtime senator and failed presidential candidate was a speaker at the fifth annual Insights symposium, which brings prominent world figures together to discuss current topics. Among those joining Dole were former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto and retired anchorman Walter Cronkite.

HSCN Hell

When I am not starting the research for a 42-page paper due the next day, getting drunk and puking at AEPi parties, or sifting through the dorm trash rooms looking for food, I watch television. I know some of you elitists think that the boob tube serves no purpose, but it keeps me off the streets and from joining gangs. It is also a great stress reliever. Unfortunately, here in Bulgerland, HSCN (Housing Services Campus Network) has all but ruined my simple little pastime. My reception is the pits, the channels blow, and doing anything about it requires more time and effort than being a double major.

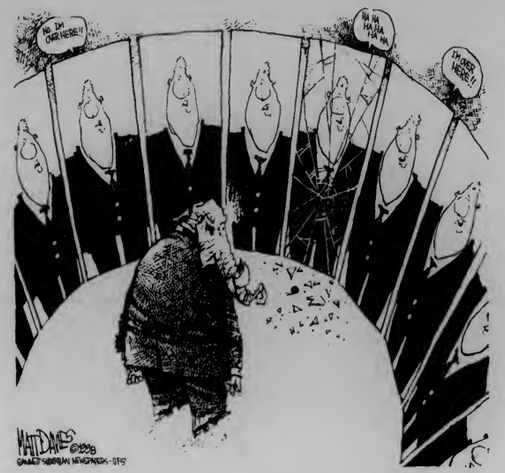
Lenny Holston

The reception is horrible. I almost missed the season premiere of "Beverly Hills 90210" (yes, I am that one person over ten years old who still watches, but it is only because my girlfriend is blind and deaf and I have to transcribe it into Braille for her). Fortunately, I found another guy to watch it with who also uses the good ol' "blind and deaf girlfriend transcribing" excuse, too.

"The static is just too much. I hear it all of the time now, and it's like I have tinnitus."

It is not just for me; I have a roommate who has TV needs, too. Though he is slightly less spellbound by America's favorite electronic medium than I am, and more enveloped by MGD, his viewing needs are not any less important. When he does watch television he gets upset with the reception, too. I also want him to see, crystal-clear, the Yankees losing in the playoffs and the Sox finally winning a World Series.

I try, in vain, to watch TV in my dorm room, but the static is just too much. I hear it all of the time now, and it's like I have tinnitus. But the addiction is just too intense. I find myself desperate and watching anything I can. Last week I wasted a half hour drooling over what I thought was "Baywatch" but was just a rerun of "The Golden Girls."



There are stations that do come in, but most of them are pretty useless. How many times do you expect me to watch "The Big Lebowski" or "Spice World"? What is up with that insanely boring Wall Street station and why is there never any programming on UMass' student-run Channel 19? At least I always know what crud is being served in the Dining Commons.

I give HSCN credit for offering BET, Comedy Central (I can watch Kenny getting killed all day), Sundance, and TLC. Regardless, cable just is not cable without CNN, MTV, and HBO. Furthermore, how do you expect college males to live for at least four years with no daily dose of Sportscenter on ESPN? Damn you!

There is no cure for the HSCN blues. I have bought coaxial cables and connectors and everything else the booklet told me to. The repair service has done nothing to help. I have called them only to hear the four worst words a UMass student can hear: "Come down to Whitmore." In the real world all it takes is a phone call and you get an appointment. Not here! I had to go in person and fill out some ludicrous form saying I would allow HSCN repair- people to enter my room and fix my cable. This is to ensure that I was not one of those crank callers who gets everyone's cable fixed except their own. More time wasted; some of us have lives (I do not, but I know a guy who knows a guy who has one). The worst thing is that I have no clue on what day or at what time the repair-person will come. This robs me of experiencing the greatest joy of all — cableguy buttcracks!

HSCN should really clean up its act. Their customers are paying a $16,000 a year cable bill. That's almost as poor of a value as our AT&T long distance service. HSCN, either shape up or I am going to have to start studying.

Another Housing Nightmare

Although I'm sure you have heard many stories about our wonderful Housing Assignment Office (HAO), I have yet another blissful tale for your enjoyment. I met a student in Southwest, who we will call Fabio for now, who told me a story that clearly illustrates the incompetency of the HAO, and the frustration that they inflict.

He told me that he was a transfer student here last year, and upon entering the school, didn't even have a room. As if moving away from home wasn't stressful enough, he had to wait in line on move-in day in order to talk to the housing coordinator to see if he could live in Southwest, the area he requested. Well, to Fabio's dismay, his options were limited: either he could move into Northeast, live in a lounge, or live on a 24-hour quiet floor in Southwest until a space "opened up." Of course, the imbecile at the desk urged him to take the 24-hour quiet floor because Fabio would probably stay there once he moved in, whereas if he moved into a lounge, housing would have to move him again.

"For a split second, he almost felt guilty about cursing the HAO. But that sentiment soon subsided."

Gary Mendese

In any case, he lived on the 24-hour quiet floor for the year because there really wasn't anything else available and he grew accustomed to it. But in April, when housing preference forms were given out (beware of the word preference), he and his friend requested to live together in Emerson, and they specifically stated they did not want to live in Kennedy. Well, the illiterate buffoons at HAO placed them in Kennedy. So, following the advice from the office, they filled out another request and awaited the result over the summer.

In the last week of August, the week before move-in day, Fabio received a letter stating he was in Emerson. He almost gave birth, he was so excited. For a split second, he almost felt guilty about cursing the HAO. That sentiment soon subsided when he received a call from his friend, who we will call Billy Bob, stating that he was still in Kennedy. This was an outrage! Why would they move one person and not the other?

So, in a vain attempt to rectify the situation, both Billy Bob and Fabio called the HAO, only to find out that nothing could be done until the "room freeze" was over on September 14. After a week of frustration, the two of them just decided to give up and wait for the 14th.

In case you don't know, the "room freeze" is the one week period at the beginning of each semester where no one can move in or out of their rooms. You see, the HAO anticipates that 300 or more students will not to show up to their rooms but gives them a week to show up anyway, and therefore shafts the rest of the residents.

Well, D-Day, I mean the 14th, soon came, and to their dismay, there were no open spaces in Kennedy or Emerson, nor were there any completely open rooms anywhere in Southwest; the two friends were at a stalemate with the administration. So, after many calls and visits to the HAO, which we shall call hell, they were still stuck until a week later, when there was a light at the end of the tunnel. There was a space in Emerson!

All that had to happen now was for Fabio's roommate to move into that open space as he had agreed to do, thus creating a space for Billy Bob. However, because that open space was on a floor below the one he was currently on, the roommate, who we will call Damien, would not move.

He did have some motivation for this decision. You see, he was a freshman and had met maybe three or four people on the floor on which he was currently living. That makes sense, doesn't it? What...ever! Come on, did he really think they wouldn't be his friends anymore if they didn't live on their floor? How naive! And to top it all off, the space he was requested to move to was right next door to his best friend from home, whom he was trying to move in with! I won't say anything else, because I'll probably get upset and break something really expensive.

In any case, Fabio's belligerent roommate wasn't moving anywhere. Fabio wasn't prepared to give up, but in the meantime, he was going to try to make the best of his current situation by being cordial to his roommate. He attempted to be friendly, as he knew Damien's motivations for not moving were nothing personally directed towards him. His attempts were unsuccessful because his roommate wanted nothing to do with him, since he thought that Fabio was occupying a space his friend should be in.

Well, in a final attempt to accomplish something, Fabio went to HAO and whined and complained until surprisingly, something was done. They had found an open room for both Billy Bob and Fabio to move into. Finally, some competency was seen. He proceeded to move into his new room the next day.

Now, was it truly necessary for me, I mean Fabio to go through this? I think not. I know I've been bashing the employees at HAO and perhaps that's not fair. I know they're doing their jobs, but they either need to be taught more, or they need to change the system all together. It's probably the worst system I've encountered. Making people wait in line like cattle to possibly get a room is unnecessarily stressful and gives this school a bad name. It needs to be fixed now.

SkankBoston

Okay, here's the deal: banks suck. BankBoston should be called SkankBoston. Seriously, it's the whore of the banking world. These guys charge you for everything. A hello is about a dollar. A friendly hello, well that's a buck-fifty. Thank you, if you would please bend over we'll also give you a free induction into our reserve credit program. I am probably one of the only people left in this town to still put up with this form of dictatorship. If I didn't still owe them some money (hey, I gotta eat...and drink...and...), I'd close my account. Why am I in such a state over this (aside from the fact that I live in the land of Nocash)? Try this on.

Having misplaced my bank card, I went to the branch office in Amherst, cancelled it, and ordered a new one. Ten days later I called the "800" number — the only thing that's free in banking — and asked where my card was. Their reply: "We show that you cancelled your card, but no request was made for a new one." Obviously I use the fiber- optic connection from my ass to wire myself cash so why would I need a new card?! I explained to them that I needed a new card immediately. "That's going to be a fifteen-dollar charge to your account," they said. Of course, because God knows, I've got money to spare.

After trying in vain to explain to them that I should not be charged for expediting the arrival of my new card because I had ordered the card two weeks prior, I was met with the reply, "that's going to be a fifteen-dollar charge." Of course.

I think we can all agree that I made the mistake. If I had simply altered reality and the fabric of space and time so that my card had not been misplaced, this never would have happened. After being informed of my right to talk to the nearest BankBoston representative about the surcharge ("it's not something we handle over the phone"), I acquiesced. There's a certain amount of job security that goes along with being able to hang-up on your customer at any time, I suppose.

Well, about two weeks later, not yet having spoken with my representative (what do they represent anyway?) I noticed an odd occurrence in my account balance: I was short over fifty dollars! Ah, I know you're wondering now, "why, pray tell, (because people actually think like that) would that be?" The funny thing is, it seems that the fifteen- dollar surcharge was only the beginning. Because of my perfect timing between paying rent, depositing my paychecks, paying the surcharge, and paying for other amenities, I was subject to more surcharges. The fifteen- dollar charge meant they had to dip into my reserve credit. Oh yes, the overdraft charge of $22 applies, despite the fact that they created this whole fiasco. Follow this up with an over-the-limit fee, which is obviously due to my erroneous banking, and I am loving life!

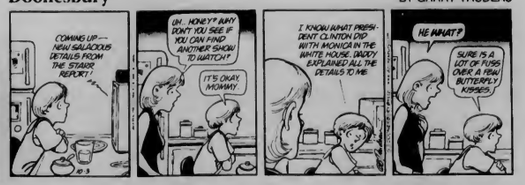
Banking is synonymous with spanking. All I ever get for my mediocre attempts at maintaining a positive balance in an otherwise negative environment, is an account full of dung. So, I went in to the branch office to resolve this. Please keep in mind that for the past three weeks, I couldn't get to the bank before it closed. I start work at my campus job at eight, and I have class at 9:30 each morning. I'd love to be able to stop in before class, but guess what, the gestapo doesn't open until ten in the morning. "Well, surely they must be open until late in the evening," you say. If you consider four o'clock to be evening, check when the sun sets, Sparky, 'cause it ain't evening in my world. I work, I go to class, and then I try to resolve my personal life (I don't actually have one, but if I did, this would be the perfect time to do so). I'm a college student with a job, and it's not exactly easy to get in to do some spanking...I mean banking.

Three weeks and fifty-some odd dollars in the hole, guess who's not loving life? That would be the guy who doesn't make a friggin' buck off every ATM transaction. Yeah, me. I'm that guy. So what happens in the end? They give me the money. My Money. They SHOW ME THE MONEY! This couldn't have been resolved earlier with a phone call?!?!?



After all the angst, all the tossing and turning at night (wondering how I'm going to go out to the bars with no beans), and all the "I'd love to go in on it, but I'm tapped" tales of woe, they just give me back my money!

Okay, maybe I just refuse to be happy with anything, but think about it. They tell me they can't waive the charge over the phone, make me incur over $50 in surcharges, talk to someone unrelated to the issue, THEN get my card, and have the almighty honor of paying a dollar per use of my card in their hell-spawned machines! I'm keeping my money in a sock under my pillow from now on. The least they could have done after putting me through hell, is give me some sort of indication that they should have given me my card with no charge. Truly there is no justice in this world. If there were, people would be happy we're up $70,000,000 in the budget.

So this is a call to arms my people! Forget about Clinton, drop the smoking ban issue, if you don't like horse meat, don't go to the DC. But remember, SkankBoston is here to stay. Back at SIS, they don't charge you for ATM use, at least. Better yet, Satan's got a pretty good interest rate these days. One more payment 'til I get my soul back...

Relive The History of New Africa House

The African American, Latino, Asian, Native American, (ALANA) community, know all too well the ten steps and black wooden doors which lead to the offices, facilities, services and departments located in the New Africa House.

It stands alone among all other residence halls due to the uniqueness of its purpose and the history.

It is most necessary to every person of color on this campus, especially the new class of freshmen who arrived through the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS).

CCEBMS is an academic support program to ensure the development of African American, Cape Verdean, Latino, West Indian and other minority students. It is also the master key which unlocks a piece of untold history.

The New Africa House was not always called the New Africa House and CCEBMS was not initially included in the establishment of the University. During the Fall semester of 1968, a group of African American students empowered themselves and took over the New Africa House, formerly known as Mills House Residence Hall. This was due to an unmet list of grievances and a lack of resources for black students.

Michael M. Thelwell, a professor of the Afro-American Studies department relays the story.

In 1967, eight black faculty members from the University and Five College Community, including Esther Terry, head of the African American Department, Randolph Bromby, who would later become the first black chancellor, and professor Thelwell, wrote a proposal securing one million dollars from The Ford Foundation. This grant was to provide for recruitment and support of black students to attend the University.

In the Fall of 1968, 125 African American students enrolled at the University, becoming the first group of CCEBMS students. They united and formed a black student organization. As a collective, they stated requests for resources, programs and services to accommodate their presence.

The University administration promised space for the foundation of a black cultural center, but the requests were left unfulfilled. This was a large part of their argument when discussing the necessity for black studies and programs.

"Like most white operations, 'they' acted as though black people do not exist," said Thelwell.

Simultaneously, as conversations between administration and the Black Student Organization continued, the Mills House residence hall was being renovated. The plan was to make the top floors of Mills House available to the black community.

"The newly created department, W.E.B. DuBois African American Studies, was asked to claim responsibility for Mills House."

Cassandra Carty

Frequently the black students held meetings on the first floor of Mills House regarding current issues. At the end of one meeting, as black students were leaving, two cars had a fender-bender at the end of Infirmary Way. One car was driven by Don Brown, an African American, and the other by a white athlete who lived in a residential hall located across the street from Mills House.

The car accident led to heated words between the two drivers, and then to an exchange of blows. The black students adjourned and rushed to the scene to meet their friends. The white students rushed to support theirs. The black students, realizing they were outnumbered, retreated and occupied Mills House.

This was to be the first building occupation in the history of UMass.

The black students, realizing insufficient security and backup, found it advisable to secure the two upper-level floors of Mills House where unaware white students were sleeping.

As a purely defensive precaution, the black students expelled the white residents of Mills House into the cold snowy night in their pajamas. These students who had retired for the night were greatly discomforted. Many residents of Mills House called home to and complained of this rude intrusion. It happened by chance that one of the parents was a Massachusetts legislator. Within a couple of hours, legislators were on the phone with the administration complaining about "rampaging blacks."

The administration was faced with two problems. First, how to appease the angry legislators and second, the Black Student Organization whose members said that they would not be moved. Administration realized that this was a public relations disaster. It was sending the wrong message. The administration called the police to drag the black students out.

Immediately, members of the existing black faculty were called to mediate and negotiate at Mills House.

"I recall being woken up in the middle of the night," said Thelwell.

After days of mediation, agreements were reached. The newly created W.E.B. DuBois African American Studies Department was asked to claim responsibility for Mills House. After receiving full and complete responsibility for Mills House, the name was then changed by the Black Student Organization to the new educational center as we know it today: The New Africa House.

New Africa House is now home base to the African American Studies Department, Banneker Computer Lab, a host of RSO offices, Augusta Savage Art Gallery, the ALANA Honor Society program, CCEBMS Instructional Review and Tutorial Services (CIRTS), peer counseling services, and most importantly CCEBMS.

"A man who lacks historical identity is severely handicapped," said Joseph Boskin, co-director of the American Studies Program at the University of Southern California, quoted January 30, 1969 in a Collegian article.

It is very important to know one's past history before moving forward.

Visit New Africa and the CCEBMS department.

"In the future we will continue to provide support for many more minority students as they matriculate and then graduate from UMass," said Dr. Floyd H. Martin, director of CCEBMS.

Let's hope.

CCEBMS is here for you

The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students, more commonly known as CCEBMS, is here to "facilitate the admission, graduation and development of African American, Cape Verdean, Latino and other minority students."

The program was established in 1967 by black faculty and staff from the University of Massachusetts and the Five College community. The first CCEBMS class was composed of 125 black students enrolled at UMass. Since then, the program has grown. Today 1000 students are affiliated with CCEBMS.

Dr. Floyd H. Martin, who has served as the director of the program since 1990, views CCEBMS as an effective program which can assist and guide students through their careers here at the University. "Students have to take ownership of the program — it's your program!"

CCEBMS offers many services such as academic and personal counseling by a trained professional staff, peer advising, tutorials, a resource/study center, various workshops, access to the Banneker Computer Lab, ALANA Honor Society membership opportunities, and referrals to other resources such as jobs on campus, internship opportunities, scholarship opportunities, and graduate school information.

With so many resources, shouldn't all ALANA students become high achievers here at UMass?

Dr. Martin believes that the number one reason black and Latino students end up on academic probation here at UMass is, "that these students in particular are not applying themselves when they first come to UMass — not studying, too many extra-curricular activities, and joining too many RSO's. It has nothing to do with ability. All of our students have the ability — If they didn't, we wouldn't bring them here."

"Stay focused and keep your goals in mind at all times. Be selfish about the use of your time," Martin said.

Many times, though, students can put in plenty of quality study hours, organize yourself really well, and have a genuine drive to succeed but due to forces beyond their control, encounter hardships. What is a student to do?

"The student should come in and see their academic advisor who will discuss whatever the problem may be. If necessary, he/she will refer them to other people on campus and/or beyond who can help them," Martin said.

Many of our students often lack study skills. Study skills are something that we all need in order to succeed at any institution of higher learning.

"You do not have to be in serious academic trouble to see you advisor— by then it is to late. Take the preventive measures — talk to your advisor."

Edgar A. Barros

"The reason some our students do not succeed here at UMass has nothing to do with ability," Martin said.

Martin also suggests that "students should spend three hours per each enrolled credit studying. Therefore, if a student is carrying 15 credits, he or she should be studying 45 hours a week."

That may be a surprise to many students. Where can they possibly go and effectively get some studying done? There are many places available, but choosing one can be homework in itself.

"Libraries are always a good place. Any place where it's always quiet and others are respectful of other's study time can work. Your dorm is often not the best place due to the lack of respect among hallmates," Martin said.

On the subject of jobs and extra-curricular activities, Martin advises, "After you've analyzed the amount of time you have to study, if you want to work or get involved in extra-curricular activities, develop a tight time management schedule. CCEBMS can help you with this."

As we all know, life at UMass can sometimes get somewhat blurry. With all the things that go on up here, we can sometimes lose focus.

"Always keep your goal in mind. You should also try to interact with as many different kinds of people while you're here on campus. There are people from all over the world — all different cultures — interact and learn from each other," Martin said.

Students should take heed of Martin's advise and suggestions. He has been an undergraduate student before; he has lived through what students are living through now. Furthermore, he not only brings student experiences to the table, but he also brings life experiences.

All CCEBMS students should "take ownership of this program" by visiting with their advisors at least twice a month.

Students do not have to be in serious academic trouble to see an advisor — by then it is to late. Take the preventive measures — talk to an advisor. Utilize the CCEBMS program.

Sahuur Abdul-Kareem, a CCEBMS advisor, says, "Visit with your advisor and peer mentors often, and learn from the experiences of the upper-classmen."

Martin encourages us to not take our responsibilities lightly. Students at UMass are some of the very few from the black and Latino communities to make it to an institution of higher learning.

We must continue to prove our critics wrong. We must demonstrate to others as well as ourselves, that we do belong here.

How about here and now?

Does civilization actually mean civilized? I was watching a documentary recently which featured a tribe of people living in the rainforest of South America. What I found so noticeable about this tribe, or any that I have seen on television, is that there is no "me" or "I" but rather "we" and "us". However, in this culture (America) it's every man and woman for themselves; there is no sense of unity as a society. We are divided by ills such as oppression, suppression, racism, ignorance, bigotry, greed, hatred and a list of regrets go on and on.

Whether or not you realize it consciously or subconsciously, every organism has one thing in common — life. As humans we are in control, we are the navigators, the engineers, the owners, the headmasters of our future and the future of the world.

Nevertheless, I visited a church and if anyone reading this has ever visited or is a member of a Afro-American church or any church, knows that the underlying sentiment is obtaining or inheriting a better life after "death." Why not now? Why do I have to wait until I'm dead to live without all the ills of the world? When are we all going to realize that we are the owners of our future? When are we all going to realize that we don't have to continue to enslave ourselves to the will of those who are so called, "in charge?"

We don't need a revolution, we don't need to picket, we don't need to demonstrate, because if we do we are only demonstrating against ourselves. We have the power whether we are students, beggars, lawyers, doctors, professors, etc.; the power is already ours. Think about it, if the government says no and the people say yes, guess who is going to prevail.

"I want a better life now. As a young Afro-American male my reality is one that is disgusting, nasty, and threatened."

I want a better life now. As a young Afro-American male my reality is one that is disgusting, nasty, and threatened. Let's take a look at one of our revolutions: the industrial revolution. The industrial revolution did not start with the steam engine, this revolution started with the people. Just like the industrial revolution, the revolution to save the world will not and does not entail a massive movement, or a bunch of reactionary laws. It does however entail that Caucasians stop pointing the finger at Afro- Americans, and immigrants, and take a nice long look at their bank accounts and ask themselves, "Who is running the country and what does their bank account look like". Yes it is time that Caucasians get a grip on reality and stop proposing that people of African descent are the reason for your struggle, because believe it or not, if it wasn't for black people and mother Africa, you would not exist.

Let's say that if Caucasians had stayed in Europe with their cabbage and plagues, Natives and their buffalo were left alone, and Africans were left in Africa with all the riches of the world... this world would be a better place. Beautiful thought isn't it.

So now that they have created a system that continuously seek to brainwash the masses into thinking that because there are a few rich people, it is the fault of black people that others are not rich. This is what the rich would like us to believe so that we can continue to fight over the little scraps that they occasionally throw out.

Think about it if we all stop fighting...

It is time that we all demand better and not worse for each other.

Peace.

Shaman dance brings Korea to life

By Kate Halpern
Collegian Correspondent

IN-YOUNG SOHN
Student Union Ballroom
October 2

The lights dim as a small delicate woman steps onto the stage. Her moments are soft, and her face solemn. She moves slowly, yet seems to display an inner movement that speeds. She expresses dignity and poise as she flows across the dance space with small but sweeping steps. Her movements tell stories of dynasties and wars, of a thousand lives, and a vibrant culture. She is dance; she is Korea.

Long before the Internet, the printing press or even the written word, dance existed in every culture throughout the world. Dance is the visual history of a culture. Friday night, thanks to the Asian Dance and Music Center in conjunction with Smith College, UMass was given the opportunity to view Korea's rich history through the dancing talents of In-young Sohn.

Sohn, educated in Seoul, Korea as well as New York's Columbia University, graced the Student Union Ballroom stage with three different religious dances. Each one, unique yet connected, displayed different ritual dances related to Shamanism.

The dance I found most moving was the third, "Hallyangmu." This dance comes from an ancient mask dance drama. Sohn, dressed in ceremonial men's garb, tells the story of a wise scholar. In the traditional Korean society, scholars were regarded as men of great formality and discipline. Sohn took on an air of wisdom and craftiness that made the dance the most lively of the three.

To explain the significance of each piece, Smith College Professor Jinhee Kim provided the audience with an historical background of Korean Shamanism and the role of women in it. I was surprised to find what a major role women in Korea have played in keeping Shamanism rituals alive. Although Shamanism is rarely practiced today, Sohn seeks to keep its memory alive. She is working to fuse modern movement with the classical forms of Shamanism ritual dance. She works hard to keep the dance and music which is the essence and history of Korea alive.

In one dance, the reeds blow strong, signifying the call to rise the dead. A small white scarf, symbolizing the spirit, is pulled through the air. Dressed in ceremonial attire, she moves; she teaches; she keeps the message alive.

Carly returns to "GH"

"General Hospital" fans take notice. October 6 is the day we've all been clamoring for. Sarah Brown (a.k.a. Carly) makes her triumphant return to the soap. Here's hoping she rips Robin's hair out or at least what's left of it. God knows Jason and Robin's romance could use a boost. Haven't they been such a bore the past few weeks? Isn't it interesting that rumors of Robin leaving the "GH" canvas seem to coincide with Carly's return? Coincidence? I wouldn't count on it. Bob Guza and company are being awfully vague about Carly's return but my guess is she'll give Jason an ultimatum. Robin or Michael? Either way, Jason and Robin fanatics should enjoy the couple's current cozy situation while they can, because in a few weeks they can kiss it all goodbye.

You know what I'd love to see? How about a torrid little affair between Ned and Carly? I know it sounds crazy but I noticed some chemistry between the two when Ned made a visit to the asylum a few months back. Just think of the fuel it would add to Ned and A.J.'s already jealous rivalry. Not only that, but you can imagine Alexis and Carly duking it out for Ned's affections? Meow! Wouldn't that be yummy? And let's be honest, the Ned/Alexis romance is going nowhere fast.

Over at "Sunset Beach," you guys missed a doozy last Friday. Just when you thought Virginia couldn't sink any lower in her quest to snag Michael, she manages to top herself once again. I'll give you a hint. What does Tyus' sperm, Virginia, Vanessa and a turkey baster have in common? Well, last Friday Virginia slipped Vanessa a mickey and, while she passed out, tried to impregnate her with, you guessed it, a turkey baster. No lyin' folks, I almost split a gut laughing so hard. Isn't that wacky? Of course her plan was foiled but she's determined to give it another try.

But the funniest thing was her declaration after the fact. She said to herself (a la "Days of Our Lives"), "Hope you guys (Tyus' sperm) are in a swimming mood because either way — Vanessa's going to get basted!"

Ohh...it was too much. You guys really need to check "SB" out. It's one of my guiltiest pleasures in life, second only to the Backstreet Boys. Be sure to catch today's episode when Maria, Ben's presumed dead wife, "crashes" Ben and Meg's nuptials.

You've probably noticed that I haven't mentioned much about "Days" recently. It's honestly because it's taken me a while to catch the

Jacob Fanning's Soap Chat

"Days" fever again. Early last year I used to be the soap's biggest fan, but the show kind of lost my interest over the summer. It just bored me to tears. Don't even get me started about the "Swamp Girl" fiasco — which is a bit tacky, even by "Days" standards. The show seemed to be trying to find an identity but couldn't decide between a more serious approach ("GH") or the campy, antic driven soap we've come to love. Finally, though, the show seems to have found a direction and is thriving with Franco's death and the circumstances surrounding it.

I'm so glad to see that Kate hasn't lost her bitchy touch and Sami is finally getting the justice she so rightly deserves. It's good to see her squirm for once. It looks like I might finally get my wish with Carrie and Mike too. I've been dying to see the two of them admit their feelings for one another. I'm sorry, but Austin doesn't do it for me.

There's only one gripe I have with the show and that's the blossoming (you could have fooled me) romance between Nicole and Eric. I've seen wallpaper more exciting than these two "lovebirds." The chemistry just isn't there. I know the show's desperate to mold Jensen Ackles into daytime's next big thing, but this insipid romance isn't the way to go about it. In any case, it might have taken awhile, but the show's grown on me. Looks like I'll be skipping that 1:00 class after all.

There's some sad news on the "One Life to Live" front. Roger Howarth is indeed leaving the soap to pursue a career in film. He's due to appear in one of Spike Lee's upcoming movies. That's a huge blow to the show, especially given the soap's current ratings woes. Rough translation: the show needs all the help it can get. And let's not forget Todd has always been one of "OLTL"'s biggest draws, especially among the ladies. He's been a riot these past few weeks. Expect him to leave sometime next month. No word as to how he'll depart the show, but my bet is that he'll be whisked off to jail after the feds realize he's faking multiple personality syndrome. For those of you who are slightly upset about this news, don't forget, he's left the show before only to come back months later. I have a feeling we haven't seen the last of him.

Sink or Swim:

Sink:

— The Red Sox game...for interrupting our meetings at the Blue Wall. The jocks have taken over not one, but all three TV's in the Campus Center (just joking, guys).

— Anyone happen to catch that cheesy "All My Children" promo with Kit and the rest of the show's most recent additions? Tacky doesn't even begin to describe how ludicrous they are. Is ABC intentionally trying to sabotage daytime? Not only that but check out the threads they're wearing. It's like some kind of 80's nightmare.

Swim:

— To the mounting sexual tension between Brad and Camille on "As the World Turns." These two are HOT!

— To Tad and Dixie's kiss on "AMC." Still got it after all these years.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You're not one to be hurried in any way today. Approach every activity with care, having prepared thoroughly beforehand.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may be unusually harsh when it comes to other people's feelings today. During evening hours, someone is sure to break through your shell.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may vacillate between two choices today, unsure which will get you the results you most desire.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You're likely to be quite stable today, despite the emotional atmosphere at work and at home.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You'll be attracted to those who share your temperament and artistic outlook today. Step up communication to seek out those with firm plans.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You're feeling confident– even cocky– today. Be careful; not everyone thinks you're the center of the universe.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may be more interested in physical than mental pursuits today. Your body is crying out to be challenged– in more ways than one!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may be quiet and introspective during the first part of the day, but later on you'll be eager to share your opinions.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Your desires are increasing. Balance the urges driving you in different directions simultaneously.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Be persistent, detailed, and even painstaking in your efforts today if you expect to reap the rewards available to you at this time.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You won't satisfy that special someone with the same old attention today. Be willing to add dash and panache to your repertoire!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — This may not seem to be a highly romantic day on the surface, but, underneath, your passions are beginning to demand special attention.

UM upsets No. 5 Hofstra in comeback

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y.— Note to reader: what you are about to read is merely a figment of your imagination. It does not actually exist, for what took place at Hofstra Stadium on Saturday is truly impossible to put into words. So just go with it.

The entire crowd just sat still. Could it be? Did that just happen? Forty points in the second half? Against us, the fifth-ranked team in the nation? Naw, couldn't be. We beat these guys by 38 last year.

Hofstra	35

But it happened. When the gun sounded, the Massachusetts men's football team (3–1, 1–0 in the A-10) was left standing, upending the No. 5 Flying Dutchmen 40–35, in a game that those in attendance will be talking about for years.

Down a point with nine seconds remaining, quarterback Todd Bankhead finished off the storybook half with a storybook ending by finding receiver Adrian Zullo just across the goal line from 15 yards out.

"The coach just told me, if they had man, we were going to go front side to [receiver Jimmy Moore], but if they give a zone, we were going to go backside to Adrian," Bankhead said, "and I saw a zone so I dropped back, didn't see it, and I just threw where I knew Adrian would be and he made a great play."

Zullo, on a bum ankle, came from the right side into the front of the end zone, where he needed to slide to make the catch. It was only the freshman's second catch of the game.

It was almost fate for the Minutemen once they had climbed back into contention. On the final drive, they used a personal foul penalty on Hofstra and a non-call on an interception by safety Amad Anderson, after referees determined his feet did not land in bounds. Bankhead also recovered his own fumble after a sack and found Jimmy Moore for a 28-yard gain after an 18-yard holding call.

Bankhead threw for a career-high 348 yards, after a first half that saw him complete only seven of 16 passes for 52 yards. He answered back when called upon, tossing three scoring passes in the second half.

In fact, only stopping Marcel Shipp on fourth down at the goal could keep Hofstra from dishing out the perfect half. Six of seven second half drives resulted in touchdowns for UMass.

"These kind of halves are how you make a champion," coach Mark Whipple said. "It was a great win for both sides."

Moore's role has slowly inclined over the past few weeks, and that could not have been more evident than in Saturday's contest. The senior transfer from SMU brought down 11 receptions for 164 yards, 10 of which came in the second frame.

Hofstra took a 12–0 lead going into the locker rooms after a first half that saw three turnovers and a safety go against the Minutemen. UMass came out hungry in the second half, and took only two minutes to get on the board. Deep in its zone, Dutchman punter Doug Kralich's kick was blocked by Dan Healey and recovered by Willie Hemmer in the end zone. The big play by the special teams opened the floodgates.

"We worked on it all week, going after their punts because we thought they were kind of soft," Healey said. "The seam opened up and we just blew through and blocked it."

Hofstra fell victim to three blown punt protections, which resulted in 21 UMass points.

Minuteman linebacker Khari Samuel did not take a snap after sitting out the second half last week with a bruised right bicep. Compton Webster took his place and recorded 6 tackles and two sacks.

Shipp followed a career rushing day last week against Buffalo with 224 total yards and two receiving touchdowns.

"I don't vote [in the top 25 polls], but I'd vote us on character alone," Whipple said.

The Minutemen take on James Madison University next weekend at McGuirk Stadium. The Dukes are 1–4, coming off a loss to Richmond.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

UMass quarterback lead the second half charge for the Minutemen, with 348 yards passing and three touchdowns on rout to a 40–35 win over Hofstra.

UM refuses to lose

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

HEMPSTEAD, NY — In their game at Hofstra University on Saturday, it didn't seem like the Massachusetts football team knew how to do anything right. It turned out they didn't even know how to lose right.

The first half of UMass' matchup with the Flying Dutchmen was a comedy of errors. Minutemen Kerry Taylor and Jimmy Moore dropped potential touchdown passes from quarterback Todd Bankhead, whose second quarter fumble was recovered and transported to the end zone 65 yards in the opposite direction, giving Hofstra defensive end Chris McIntyre the only touchdown of the half.

His teammate, defensive tackle James Magda, was the first player in the game to get on the scoreboard, swallowing UMass tailback Marcel Shipp in the end zone for a safety with 8:13 to go in the first quarter.

Massachusetts put the ball on the ground four times in the opening half, giving their opponents possession three of those times. Hofstra dominated that section of time, not only outscoring the Minutemen 12–0, but moving the ball 258 yards to a humble UMass output of 98.

In fact, the only reason the Dutchmen tallied only 12 points by halftime was that they were shooting themselves in the foot with almost as much frequency as the Minutemen.

In the first two quarters, Hofstra summoned the referees' attention nine times, totalling 71 penalty yards — including a number of poorly timed infractions that stalled possible scoring drives.

Hofstra kicker Chad Johnson left nine possible points unscored as well, missing three field goals before the break.

The Minuteman defense managed to contain the typically high-scoring Flying Dutchmen, by continuing their season- long strength: their red-zone defense.

"When you're playing so poorly, and you have three turnovers and a safety in the first half, and are only down 12-0, you just have to credit the defense so much," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said.

When the second half rolled around, however, Massachusetts just couldn't lose right.

Hofstra drove the proverbial final nail in the Minuteman coffin several times after halftime, and each time UMass refused to be buried.

A 15-yard low bullet over the middle from Bankhead to freshman Adrian Zullo just beyond the goal line, with UMass down by one point, finished off a 40-point second half explosion with three ticks to go on the clock.

Shipp, who, aside from two twenty-yard bursts was silent in the first half, caught two touchdown passes and ran for 146 yards.

Bankhead turned his game around and added 296 passing yards and three touchdowns to his light first half stat line. Moore, who was suspect by halftime, responded by having a career day — 11 receptions for 164 yards.

"On offense, obviously, we were non-existent in the first half, and I didn't really see much panic at halftime," Whipple said. "The defense played a great first half, and then the offense came back and made the plays."

That's not a team that knows how to lose correctly.

When Dutchman receiver Wayne Yearwood took a Giovanni Carmazzi pass 34 yards in for the score to cancel out Minuteman defensive back Willie Hemmer's recovered punt block in the end zone a drive earlier, UMass should've been disheartened: but they weren't.

When Carmazzi took a naked bootleg around the left end for 76 yards and an embarrassing rushing touchdown, Massachusetts should've hung their heads: but they answered.

When Hofstra runningback Vaughn Sanders took a simple screen pass 44 yards for another frustrating score with 3:08 to play in the game, putting the hosts up 35–34, the Minutemen should've given up: but they won.

Meyers and UMass Volleyball sweep two in Atlantic 10

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's volleyball team has been in some such situations this season where they were close in big games, but failed to keep the pressure on the opposition and eventually came up short.

That didn't happen this time for UMass. The Minutewomen took a very strong George Washington team to five games, and they won in a very close fifth game 15-13. Then the very next night the Minutewomen took the Fordham Rams to five games and won the match in the fifth game, 17–15.

"The reason we were able to win these games is because we stayed very aggressive and we defended really well," said UMass coach Bonnie Kenny.

With the two huge Atlantic 10 conference victories, The Minutewomen improve their record to 7–8 overall and 4-2 in the conference.

The Minutewomen came through as a team in Friday night's effort against the Colonials of GW. The key for UMass in the GW match was to be the setting of freshman, Heather Holtsberg. Holtsberg came through in the clutch with 55 assists and added six defensive digs.

"In the GW match, we knew that their blocking in the middle was really tight, so we had to work the antennas with our outside hitters," Kenny said.

LAUREN EUSEY / COLLEGIAN

Junior co-captain Jill Meyers helped lead the UMass womens volleyball team to two big conference wins over GW and Fordham.

Holtsberg came through with those outside sets for UMass. The creative setting by Holtsberg supplied great opportunities for Kari Hogancamp, Jill Meyers and freshman outside hitter Janeen DeMarte.

Meyers came through with 21 kills and 10 digs, while Hogancamp and DeMarte combined for 24 kills and 33 defensive digs.

GW	2

"Jill had a great weekend. She was terminating really well and because she was hitting so well, it created a lot of one-on-one opportunities for Kari, and she was able to put balls away," Kenny said.

Fordham	2

In the Fordham match the Minutewomen were prime candidates for a let down after such a big win the night before, but this was not the case. UMass came to play with the Rams. The match was up and down. UMass dropped the first game 15–9, but bounced back to win games two and three in stellar fashion, 15–3 and 15–7. The Minutewomen lost a tough one in game four, 15–12 and trailed 13–10 in game five before coming back to win 15–13.

The biggest hero in the Fordham game for UMass was Meyers. Meyers tallied 32 kills and hit for an attack percentage of .426.

"Jill terminated when she had to and when someone is swinging that well, you have to give them the ball," said Kenny. "She (Meyers) reached the 1000 kills milestone last weekend, and now she joined another elite club with 30 kills in a match."

Kari Hogancamp also had a great weekend burying 15 kills and scraping up 22 digs against Fordham alone. Hogancamp had a stellar weekend, despite playing with an injured abdominal muscle.

"Kari played well. We were worried about how she would feel for Saturday's match knowing that she had played a tough game against GW, but she came through," said Kenny. "Kari also benefitted a lot from Jill swinging well because they doubled her (Meyers) on blocks, which created many one-on-one opportunities for Kari, and she can put those away."

Jennifer Drennan, who played many full rotations, played really well for UMass. Drennan had many of the intangibles: namely eight digs, three blocks and a couple of kills.

"Jennifer played awesome for us! She passed really well, played great defense and served well. She also got a lot of deflections at the net. I don't believe we could have beat Fordham without her play," Kenny said.

The Minutewomen take their three-game winning streak on the road against Rhode Island on Wednesday night in Kingston, RI. These clutch conference wins on the road can serve as a real momentum builder for the Minutewomen as they head into the remainder of their conference schedule. Of their fourteen remaining conference matches, eight will be within the friendly confines of Curry Hicks Cage.

There is no rest yet for UMass, as they still have road dates with URI and St. Bonaventure before coming home for a set of five matches in which four are conference tilts.

UMass defeats SJU, falls to Temple

By Michael Kobylanski

Emma Kurowski's game–winning goal two minutes and 51 seconds into the second overtime of Sunday's 2–1 victory over St. Joseph's was by no means the prettiest goal that the junior forward has ever scored. The bottom line, however, is that it got the job done.

UMass	2
St. Joes	1

UMass	1

The Sutton, Massachusetts product pinballed a shot off the right post which eventually made its way into the back of the net. Most importantly, however was the fact that with Kurowski's fifth goal of the year came a collective sigh of relief from the bench of the Massachusetts women's soccer team, a squad that was happy to come away with a well– deserved victory.

"Things went our way today," said Kurowski in comparison to a tough 2–1 loss to Temple on Friday afternoon. "I got by one of their defenders and saw an open net, so I just went for the far corner. This win was important because we are in league play now, and we need to play well every game."

"We outplayed them [St. Joe's] by a ton. In fact, we outplayed two teams by an awful lot this weekend. But these kids [his team] showed a lot of character today," said UMass Coach Jim Rudy.

The true test of character for the Minutewomen came late in the second half, when some miscommunication by UMass keeper Cori Stevens and defenders Amanda Thompson and Anna Morozuk resulted in the game–tying goal. St. Joe's forward Ellen–Carine Stenrud gathered a loose ball in the box and lifted it into the top left corner to even the game at 1–1 with 14:14 left to play in regulation.

"It was just a fortunate knock-down for them," said Rudy in regards to the game–tying goal. "I think a lot of teams would have died, especially one with all of the adversity that we've had, but we fought and scrapped and won it."

Stenrud was hungry for the game–winner just over 12 minutes later, but freshman keeper Cori Stevens punched her bid away and kept the game even.

"It looked like that was going to be it [the game–winner], but Cori made a big save," Rudy said.

And Kurowski made that save stand up when she took a pass from Kara Green and booted home the game–winner. Green also scored UMass' first goal on a left–footed blast with 28:35 to play in regulation. Freshman Katelyn Jones set up Green's team–leading seventh goal of the season.

"We deserved to win today, and we needed this win because we have to start picking our heads back up," Green said. "I think we were a little down after the loss the other day because we dominated them [Temple]. Things weren't going our way, but today we finally turned things around."

According to Rudy, who earned his 150th win at UMass thanks to Kurowski's game–winner: "The kids had good focus and adhered to our tactical plan. [And as far as the milestone] I guess it means I've had a few good players here."

UMass (4–7, 1–1 in the Atlantic 10) dropped a tough 2–1 contest to Temple on Friday afternoon at Totman Field. The Minutewomen totally dominated the Owls, but two early goals held up for the visitors.

"We dominated them early, we dominated them in the middle, and we dominated them late," Rudy said. "It was a good effort, but we just didn't finish."

With Temple leading 2–0 midway through the second half, Kurowski blasted home a shot to cut the Temple lead in half to 2–1. The Minutewomen, however, just couldn't notch the equalizer and fell to the Owls once again. Temple remains the only team in the history of the A–10 to beat UMass in the regular season, the only blemishes to a 30–2–3 overall mark.

UMass will next take to the field tomorrow night at 7 p.m. when they will travel to Kingston, RI to face Rhode Island.

U.S. warns Yugoslavia of nearing NATO strikes

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia (AP) — With NATO attacks possibly only days away, U.S. envoy Richard Holbrooke delivered an in-person, 11th-hour warning yesterday to Yugoslavia's president to halt his crackdown on ethnic Albanians in Kosovo or face airstrikes. But there was no sign Slobodan Milosevic was backing down. Following his meeting with Holbrooke, Milosevic's office issued a statement denouncing NATO threats as a "criminal act" that favored ethnic Albanian separatists.

The statement, broadcast by government television, said there had been no fighting in the Serbian province for seven days and that the crisis represented no threat to other countries. Holbrooke, the U.S. ambassador-designate to the United Nations, met with Milosevic for several hours late yesterday after arriving from Brussels, Belgium, where he conferred with senior NATO officials.

Following the meeting here, Holbrooke said he sought to convince Milosevic of "the grave situation we are facing." Holbrooke planned to visit the Kosovo capital, Pristina, today for talks with ethnic Albanian leaders, several of whom have called openly for NATO intervention.

U.S. focuses on Brazil to stop economic crisis

WASHINGTON (AP) — U.S. officials worked behind the scenes yesterday on a multibillion-dollar bailout package for Brazil as President Clinton told top finance officials from 22 nations that more must be done to combat a widening economic crisis.

"Every country has a role to play," Clinton said, specifically mentioning the need for Japan to move quickly to jump-start its own economy.

"We must ensure that the international financial architecture is prepared for the challenges," the president told finance ministers and central bank presidents from the world's richest countries and a representative group of developing nations. Clinton opened the discussions, which were to focus on three reports prepared by the 22 nations on recommended changes to the global architecture. The recommendations concerned the need to improve banking regulation and provide quicker, more accurate financial data reports to guard against unwanted surprises that might trigger foreign investors to begin pulling their money out. The special conference of finance ministers and central bank presidents, which Clinton called for last month in a New York speech, was one of several ways the administration is seeking to demonstrate leadership and instill confidence in shaky markets. But the effort so far has failed. The Dow Jones industrial average fell by as much as 233 points yesterday before staging a late rally to end the day down only 58 points.

Students hassled by unpaid bills

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts should not have problems enrolling if their bills are paid and requirements are met, but for some this semester that is not the case.

Just imagine that you are coming back from class, you attempt to swipe your card to get into your dorm, and it does not work.

Not to mention, you have been taken off the meal plan, you have lost all your classes and the University says you are no longer a UMass student because you did not pay your bill.

This nightmare has become a reality for many students. According to the Registrar's Office, more than 399 students were withdrawn from the University this semester as of September 21. Of those students, 273 were reinstated into the University as of September 22.

Registrar representatives said the purpose of withdrawing students is to distinguish between those students who have not paid their bills, but want to come to the University and those who have not paid their bills and do not plan on attending the University.

"Part of the purpose of doing withdrawals is to get people withdrawn who have no intention of being here and that's why they didn't pay their tuition bills," said Registrar Elizabeth Pyle.

Bursar Dan Maguffin agrees with Pyle but added that for some students, clearing their tuition bill by the due date is difficult to do.

"If students would let the Bursar's office know that they wouldn't be able to pay, they could work something out with us, but the important thing is to inform us beforehand," Maguffin said.

However, for UMass students like Nicole Gaynor and Crystal Nunes, the problem goes beyond getting in touch with the Bursar's Office.

They, like others, were expelled from the University, but for reasons they feel were illegitimate.

According to both Gaynor and Nunes, they paid their bills on time and informed the Bursar's Office ahead of time that they would not have been able to clear their bills by August 5th. They were still withdrawn and said they were not given any prior notice or a reasonable explanation for the inconvenience they had to go through.

Nicole Gaynor planned to return to the University and pay her bill during registration week.

She had processed her Federal Application for Student Aid (FAFSA) over the summer, well in advance, and FAFSA had informed her that they would send the financial award to the University around the beginning of the school year.

When she went to the Bursar's Office to pay her tuition, with the financial aid award calculated in, she found out she owed the University a lot more.

The Bursar and the Financial Aid Office had no information of her receiving any financial aid.

According to Gaynor, she contacted the FAFSA main headquarters, and they informed her that they had sent out her S.A.R. (Student Aid Report) form. Still, she was withdrawn from the University on September 9.

"When I went to talk to the Dean of Students, she said there was absolutely nothing I could do. I was at the mercy of the Bursar and the Financial Aid Office," Gaynor said.

By that evening, she had been removed from the meal plan and she had lost all of her classes.

The next day, she called Financial Aid and asked them to make sure she would not be kicked out of housing.

They told her there was nothing she could do and they were "sorry for the inconvenience."

They referred her to one of the Financial Aid Office representatives.

"The representative called FAFSA headquarters and got confirmation of my aid over the phone," Gaynor said. "It really made me irate that all along, this whole thing could have been avoided by a phone call."

Financial Aid told her they had not received her aid because she had neglected to put "University of Massachusetts Amherst" on her form even though in subsequent years, writing the school code was sufficient enough.

Gaynor received an extension and was able to clear her bill to prevent getting kicked out of the University.

She was upset to find out from the Bursar's Office that she should have been able to access the meal plan. She was not able to access it for almost three weeks.

"If UMass had my FAFSA form as they were supposed to, I wouldn't have had to deal with all this stress," Gaynor said.

The Bursar's Office did not give her an excuse for why they did not receive her aid and had not processed it.

Student, 17, dies

University of Massachusetts student Diedre Ann DiDio, 17, of Methuen died Oct. 3 as a result of injuries sustained in a car crash on Route 2 in Athol.

DiDio was a freshman arts and sciences major, with plans to become an early–childhood educator, living in Pierpont Residence Hall.

She was born in Lawrence, Mass. and graduated from Methuen High School, where she was an honor roll student and a varsity cheerleader for four years. She would have been 18 years old this Thursday.

DiDio volunteered as a Pop Warner cheerleading coach and at the Bread and Roses Soup Kitchen, the Life Olympics for the Elderly, the AIDS Danceathon and in the local Walk for Hunger and Walk for Cancer. She also worked with children at the Growing Years Developmental and Educational Learning Center.

She leaves her parents, Richard and Barbara DiDio; her brother, Matthew; and her paternal grandparents, Charles and Evelyn DiDio, all of Methuen. She is preceded in death by her maternal grandparents, Richard and Marilyn Bradley, formerly of Salem, N.H. She also leaves numerous aunts, uncles, cousins and friends.

Calling hours will be held today from 2–4 p.m. and 7–9 p.m. at Cataudella Funeral Home, 126 Pleasant Valley St., Methuen. A funeral mass will be at St. Monica's Church, Methuen on Wednesday, Oct. 7 at 11 a.m.

Memorial contributions may be made in lieu of flowers to the Diedre DiDio Scholarship Fund, Andover Savings Bank, 91 Pleasant Valley St., Methuen, MA 01844.

A memorial service will also be held on campus at a date to be announced, according to Jo–Anne Vanin, UMass associate vice chancellor for student affairs and dean of students.

Vanin extended the University's sympathy to the DiDio family and friends.

"The accident was a tragedy," she said. "An entire community is in mourning. We need to reach out to the people of Methuen and to each other as we try to come to terms with this incomprehensible loss."

Garrabrants is new Stockbridge director

By Audie Cornish
Collegian Correspondent

Nancy Garrabrants never thought a year ago she would be where she is today.

"If someone said to me a year ago that in September '98 I'd be director of Stockbridge I would have said no, not gonna happen," Garrabrants said.

But when the University of Massachusetts Stockbridge School's interim director Richard Floyd stepped down, it was decided that the search would be internal and friends of Garrabrants urged her to apply for the permanent position.

"She has a nice, long history of involvement here," said Stockbridge registrar Elizabeth Wiernasz.

Garrabrants has served on over two dozen committees over the last twenty years as well as being the Plant and Soil Sciences Undergraduate Director and Environmental Sciences Undergraduate Program Director. It is this wealth of experience in the system that gives Garrabrants, as she says, "a clearer vision of some of the things we need to do. In the long run that will be an asset."

As a 1993 Honored Nominee for outstanding Food and Natural Sciences advisor, Garrabrants feels at home with students and encourages them to come to her not only when they have problems but just to say hello.

Garrabrants grew up in Amherst but did not attend the school.

"I've had to admit to parents that I did not graduate from Stockbridge. It was right there in my backyard," Garrabrants said.

She received her bachelor's degree from the University Without Walls program and her master's degree from the UMass Plant and Soil Sciences program. She has worked in the floral industry for over twenty years and her floriculture students often compete in the annual Boston Flower Show Exhibit.

In coming years, Garrabrants is looking for the school to gain higher visibility on campus.

"One of my new students was trying to find our building and said no one she asked knew where it was. She finally found a Stockbridge student to help her out," Garrabrants said.

More recently the school has raised enough money to send some of its Turf Management students to a turf conference in March.

Money is also being raised to send aboriculture students to the National Arboretum Association's annual National Day of Service in Washington D.C. Stockbridge was the only school invited.

Enrollment in Stockbridge Agricultural School is currently at three hundred. Students may earn an Associates Degree in any of the six programs which Garrabrants would like to expand and add more. The school will be under an internal review in 2000.

"We are teaching what students need to compete in their chosen fields," Garrabrants said.

Homeless trip an experience

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Correspondent

Spending Saturday night visiting New York City's homeless may seem unusual, but not for some students who participated in the Inter–Religious Journey last weekend.

"I didn't know how the homeless may respond to our presence. It was amazing to see how many people were on the street," said Kelley Scarmeas, a student who participated.

The journey, which lasted for 24 hours and included about 35 students, consisted of distributing goods to homeless people, as well as attending different religious services.

Chris Carlisle, organizer of the event and chaplain of the Episcopal Church, said this year's journey was a bit different. It included multi–religious activities, and involved students from other religions, including Judaism and Islam. The program, which started 10 years ago, was organized this year by David Arfa, the program director at the Hillel House, and Kent Higgins, the chaplain of the United Christian Foundation.

The cost of the trip was $10, due to a special grant through the Office of Human Relations. However, everyone was also expected to donate three pairs of men's pants as a part of the contribution to the program. At the orientation before the trip, the students were directed to keep an open mind and be attuned to the needs of the homeless.

"We're not out to give charity. This is a mutual exchange," Higgins said.

The first part of the trip included various social service activities, such as participation in soup kitchens and shelters. The highlight of the evening was the "Midnight Run," which is a nightly service providing food and clothing to the homeless. Students drove around the city and distributed soup, coffee, blankets and clothes in designated areas from midnight to three in the morning.

The Run was a moving experience for many students.

"I could never look at a cardboard box the same way again. On a rainy night, it may be someone's home," said Adam Keigwin, a senior who took part in the Run.

Not coincidentally, the trip took place on the weekend of Saint Francis, a celebration of a saint who was known for his concern for the environment and animals. The morning activities consisted of attending dawn prayer at a mosque, and then attending the Earth Mass, which is a special liturgy for Saint Francis. It took place at the Cathedral of Saint John the Divine, which is the largest cathedral in the world.

The Mass consisted of a procession of animals such as camels, bees and house pets. It also included natural objects like rocks and manure.

"I had never been to a Christian mass before, so it was an overwhelming introduction," said Jeff Perlman, a freshman who attended the religious service.

Later on, the students also built a Sukkah, to mark the Jewish holiday of Sukkot.

For Carlisle, who has participated in the journey for several years, the significance of the event does not diminish.

"A concern for the environment is bound up in the concern for one another. When you combine that, you realize that it is all bound together. I always feel myself radically changed by those experiences," he said.

Clinton fate lies in vote

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House Judiciary Committee clashed in historic debate yesterday over a Republican demand for an open-ended impeachment inquiry of President Clinton. The top GOP lawyer cited what he called "substantial and credible evidence" of 15 possible grounds for impeachment.

"Do we have a duty to look further, or to look away?" asked Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), shortly after gaveling the committee to order in the same cavernous room where Richard Nixon's fate was debated a quarter-century ago.

"This is not about Watergate," retorted Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the panel's senior Democrat. "It is an extramarital affair."

Confident of prevailing, majority Republicans pressed for a committee vote by day's end on their proposal for an investigation based on Watergate rules and unlimited in time or scope. A vote in the full House would follow by Friday.

The Republicans' lead investigator, David Schippers, broadened the counts set out by Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr to raise the possibility that Clinton took part in a broad conspiracy to cover up his actions.

Democrats countered the Republicans' proposed resolution with a plan to show their support for an inquiry limited to matters arising from the president's affair with Monica Lewinsky, and for rendering a verdict by Nov. 25.

Benning kicks off tour

By Mary Grein
Collegian Correspondent

Stirn Auditorium at Amherst College was packed beyond capacity Friday night as Sadie Benning showcased her work. Benning, an internationally acclaimed video artist, is considered an idol to many who attended.

Her work, which includes nine experimental videos is considered "just so tight," by one film major. Friday night's two screenings were the kick–off of a month and a half tour where Benning will be showcasing three films, including her most recent, a feature–length video.

The mostly female audience at Amherst College enthusiastically loved the show. It was called inspirational and Benning herself a gift to film.

Benning opened the night by showing her 1994 video "German Song." The six minute video was produced for the Boston band Come, and through various camera angles and visions, captivated the audience right from the beginning with images of a dog to a segment of scenes at Coney Island.

Her next film, "The Judy Spots," was slightly longer, running approximately twelve minutes and included five short "skits." Benning was approached by MTV to produce the film in order to help raise money for the Ms. Foundation. The clips move quickly and include sketches of Judy, the main character at the mall.

The last film, a Massachusetts premiere for Benning was entitled "Flat is Beautiful."

The film is a live action cartoon that uses masks, animation and drawings to "investigate the psychic life of an androgynous eleven–year–old girl, Taylor, who lives in a working class neighborhood of Milwaukee with her single mom and gay roommate."

"(I) made the film for myself.

■ bills

Gaynor has not been able to get into all of the classes she had pre-registered for and the inconveniences have set her back.

Now, a week after everything was settled, Gaynor received another bill from the Bursar's office saying that she owed close to $3,000 more.

"Withdrawing students is really tough, and it's not really something we enjoy doing, but it's under University policy," Maguffin said. "The ugly truth is, the bill has to be paid and yet we want to help the students get an education."

UMass student Crystal Nunes went through a similar experience in which she was withdrawn from the University for no apparent reason.

Like Gaynor, Nunes waited for her financial aid package to arrive at school before deciding to clear her tuition bill.

Nunes said there was no problem with the University finding her financial aid awards and paying the remaining tuition costs.

The Bursar teller told her, "everything is set and there shouldn't be any problems." But Nunes was withdrawn from the University and unable to register for her remaining classes.

She was also removed from the meal plan and housing. But Nunes said it was ironic that the check amount she had given the Bursar's Office had gone through her bank account.

The next day, she visited the Bursar's Office and told them she had cleared her bill and even produced the receipt.

"When I did so, the tellers just started coming up with reasons for why I must have been withdrawn," Nunes said. "I was there for almost an hour wasting my time over this preposterous circumstances."

The Bursar reinstated her into the University system and told her she would have to get back in her classes.

"This whole thing was a waste of my time," Nunes said. "It seems very random how the University arbitrarily pulls someone out of the University, producing ridiculous reasons why they did so."

A letter sent to her by Gloria Smiglelski, the Assistant Bursar, said, "additional processing requirements delayed clearing her bill by the time withdrawals were made."

Whether or not the decision to withdraw students at UMass is handled properly, remains in question. However, if students want to be sure they're not withdrawn, Maguffin has some advice.

"To make it easier for everyone, students should make sure they pay their bills on time."

It was not created to be shown on TV unlike my films in the past. It is something that I have been working on for the past four years and is very experimental," Benning said.

Her dramatic scenes engrossed the audience, leaving them speechless at times and hysterically laughing at other times. This film marks the first time Benning has focused on developing one of her characters.

Having started in 1992 with a Fisher Price camera given to her by her father, an avant-garde film maker, Benning has risen to considerable heights. Her works have been featured in the Whitney and Venice Biennale, and in solo shows at the Museum of Modern Art in New York, the Whitney Museum of American Art in New York, the Walker Art Center in Minneapolis and overseas. Her many art fellowships have included the National Endowment for the Arts and the Rockefeller Foundation.

Most recently, Benning's work received critical acclaim from The New York Times and The Village Voice after being spotlighted at the Sundance Festival.

Benning, who has never finished school, is not only a video artist, but works as a film animator, music video director and painter. She looks forward to an excellent future in the business.

"(It's) an awesome feeling to have so many people, especially peers who want to come and see my work," Benning said.

Guilty plea from Paducah gunman

By James Prichard
Associated Press

PADUCAH, Ky. — A timid-looking teen-ager who opened fire on a high school prayer circle, killing three fellow students, pleaded guilty but mentally ill yesterday and will have to spend at least 25 years in prison.

With his arms folded, Michael Adam Carneal, a slight youngster with glasses whose fair complexion and rosy cheeks made him look younger than his 15 years, acknowledged carrying out the attack last Dec. 1 at Heath High School in West Paducah.

Five other people were wounded in the rampage, one of a series of school shootings that rocked the nation during the last school year.

Defense attorney Chuck Granner said that Carneal believed that his classmates ridiculed him and that the shootings would bring him acceptance.

"Michael understands that his feelings, attitudes and beliefs at the time of the shootings were, in fact, wrong," the lawyer said. "He deeply regrets the overwhelming pain, the injuries and the loss of life that his acts have caused."

Judge Jeff Hines accepted the plea on the condition that Carneal get the maximum — life in prison without the possibility of parole for 25 years — at sentencing Dec. 16. The victims' families had originally opposed the plea because Carneal could have been eligible for parole in as little as 12 years.

"He's definitely going to serve 25 years," prosecutor Tim Kaltenbach said. "While today's events will not undo the horrible tragedy that affected and will continue to affect so many lives, we hope that in some measure it will begin to ease the pain." Carneal will be held in a juvenile detention center until his 18th birthday, when he will be transferred to an adult prison. His mental health will be evaluated, and he could receive treatment. His attorney characterized Carneal as paranoid, with aschizophrenia-like personality disorder, and said that with treatment, "we might have a chance of salvaging a young man."

A verdict of guilty to murder without the finding of mental illness carries a term of life with parole possible after 25 years. In Kentucky, a defendant must be at least 16 when the crime is committed to get the death penalty. Carneal was 14 at the time of the attack.

Granner read a statement on behalf of the Boy's parents, John and Ann Carneal, that said the family was "determined to do the right thing" for everyone.

In the Oct. 2 issue of the Daily Collegian a University of Massachusetts instructor Lisa Robinson was misidentified. The Collegian regrets the error.

Speechless in Southwest

It is finally move-in day. I've waited all summer to get away from everything (the dog, the neighbors, the job at Stop & Shop) and head out to the promised land: college. Yes, the freedom to do whatever I want whenever I want! To prepare for the real world! To play intramural flag football! To get alcohol poisoning! And perhaps attend a few classes and pick up an education! Yeah, it is definitely a great day for me, but probably the worst day of my parents' lives.

So, my mother cries and my father gives me the gruff, man-to-man handshake and I finally get them to leave. I promise to call. I promise to write. I promise to communicate via smoke signals if that is what it takes to get in contact with them, even though all they ever ask me when we talk are the same two questions:

1) Am I eating right? (No — there is nothing correct about those fish rectangles I consumed at the DC last week.)

2) Am I wearing clean underwear? (Clean is a relative term.)

They love me. They miss me. Blah blah blah. You would think I didn't have a sister at all. Actually, that's probably how she feels. Apparently Mom hasn't cooked a real meal since I left the nest. But then that light at the end of the tunnel grows nearer, and their mouths gradually break into enormous grins that I can somehow feel through the phone lines for they know, somehow, some way, that parents' weekend is approaching.

And so they came. They packed the minivan with Dinosaur fruit snacks, cases of Mountain Dew and endless phone cards and they came. My mother was the first person in the room, and from the look on her face you would have thought that she was seeing me for the first time since I had been released from some far away prison. After the obligatory hug from her and man-to-man handshake from my father, it was kind of awkward.

What do I say to these people who were with me for every day of the first eighteen years of my life? What can I say? We talked about the weather. Yes, it is unseasonably hot in Amherst for this time of year. Actually, that probably is the reason why the leaves haven't started to change color. Yeah, it is pretty uncomfortable sleeping. How is the weather back home? Better? That's good.

> "What do I say to these people who were with me for every day of the first eighteen years of my life? What can I say?"
> Rob Schulze

Just so we wouldn't have to sit around my room staring at each other, we walked around campus. My mother kept touching me, grabbing my arm or simply lightly poking me with the tip of her finger. It was like she wasn't sure that I was really there, that I just might be a figment of her imagination, that the nonexistent sea breeze might waft me away. Every time she felt my shirt under her fingers she smiled a little wider. I was fairly annoyed, but I didn't say anything. It made her happy and I really don't want to fight with them anymore. There is just no need.

My father was reliving his youth. He graduated from UMass himself, sometime in the seventies. He had a class in Morrill too, perhaps the same class I'm taking now. He remembers when some guys got drunk during a party on the Metawampee Lawn, got onto the roof of the just-built library, and when the crowd chanted "JUMP!" he jumped. In Dad's own words, "I was so shaken that I had to wait at least thirty seconds before having my next beer." Of course, he took great pains to remind me, the drinking age was eighteen then, and I should NOT get any ideas.

It was strange having them around again. I realize that it has only been a month but a great deal can change in a month. I don't need her to cook for me or do my laundry anymore. He doesn't have to show me how to change a spark plug or frown at me when I get a poor grade. They don't even know what my shirts look like or what my study habits are, and as much as I like it it's killing them.

I just don't get it — I'm really not that important. Even my friends agree with that. And then, when we finally got together, I had nothing to say to them and they had nothing to say to me.

"We love you."

"I know."

Slippery when wet

As I always do, I read the Campus Police Log last Friday, looking for a hint as to what exactly makes the UMass experience so UMass-erific. Unfortunately, I have become used to the cornucopia of misdemeanors and vagrancies listed on the page, and have even become desensitized to them. "Great — more traffic stops, more broken vending machines in Orchard Hill" (those kids are animals, by the way). It is hard to enjoy it anymore like I did as a freshman, when the idea of a raccoon-sighting in Central excited me like nothing else.

But Friday's caught my eye. Buried towards the end was a simple statement: "A guest urinated on a bed in Moore Residence Hall." I was shocked. Absolutely shocked. What shocked me more was that this was listed under "Vandalism."

"They've criminalized bed-wetting!"

This was the last straw. We've finally reverted to such a Puritanical society that now one can not even lose control of one's own functions during sleep without the authorities being called. I can only imagine that the resident was mortified to find out that his old friend could not hold it in during the night. I can understand. I was mortified when I found out one of my close friends used to live in Southwest. In a room. But that's no reason to turn them over.

If you prick them, do they not bleed? If you wrong them, do they not take revenge by drinking lots of orange juice and then taking a nap on your new comforter? Like some kind of strange intervention, the resident obviously felt compelled to call the cops on their friend, hoping to stem the tide.

"I'm making the call, man. We're getting you help!"

"No, leave me alone! I don't have a problem!"

> "We are turning bed-wetters into social pariahs. We are constructing prisons out of spent Pepsi cans and adult diapers."
> Mike Messaros

I'm glad my parents never called the cops on me. I was never a bed wetter, per se. But it happened maybe once, twice. Once in a while, you're four or five-years-old, and you're just too tired to get up and take that long walk. So you figure, "Eh, I'll just blame this one on the cat." That does not make you a criminal, though. It just makes you lazy.

And the thing is, people are getting more and more ready to change the world in order to stigmatize these poor souls. At an amusement park back home this summer, some kids caught a little e-coli and all of a sudden all these warning flags went up. It seems all these kids were in the wave pool at the water park, and one of them may have... well, I don't want to get "blue" on you. As a result, now all kids under a certain age must wear plastic pants in the pool.

For one thing, I've been to the amusement park in question, and the wave pool sucks. If you want to swim in there, it's at your own risk. For another thing — plastic pants?

An image dances through my mind of some poor kid in plastic pants, valiantly trying to stay on the rubber sheets of his bed. He tries to keep still, because every time he rolls over, he goes sliding off the bed. Each and every night this happens. As a result, poor Johnny Bedwetter gives up and sleeps on the floor, develops a nasty curvature of the spine, grows up to be hunchbacked and after all that, still wets the bed. I hear that's what happened to Nixon.

Is it really helping? Sure, we're saving ourselves a little trouble, we non-bed wetters, but what about Johnny? That kid is still wetting the bed, only now he has to suffer the ignominy of plastic pants and rubber sheets. Shame on you, America.

I visited Paris for a day this summer, and at one point I found myself sitting by this huge public fountain at the Trocadero, right by the Eiffel Tower. The water of the fountain was a sickening bluish green, and the little French kids were diving in, wearing their underoos, sliding into the water down slick granite embankments on used plastic shopping bags. Not one of them was wearing a pair of plastic pants. And I'll bet every one of them came down with a case of something the next day. But do you think this is the first time that's happened?

"What's ze matter, Pierre? You have a leettle e-coli, non? Just take a little wine, and you'll feel bettair in ze morning. Do not be so... Americain!"

People — the French are laughing at us!

Unfortunately, the knee-jerk mentality has crept into my own life. I had a friend over this weekend, and I watched him like a hawk. I did not want it to, but this whole incident raised my awareness of this vicious problem. Every time he stirred, I mentioned that the bathroom was right across the hall — no waiting. "Whatever," he said, rolling over. "You won't be saying 'whatever' when you wake up in soggy sheets, cryin' for your mama," I thought but quickly scolded myself. How could I think like this? I like to blame society.

We are turning bed-wetters into social pariahs. We are constructing prisons out of spent Pepsi cans and adult diapers. There are horrific visions of the future contained in that simple sentence in the Campus Police Log, like the isolation tent in ET, with men circling around the bed, taking readings and measurements.

It almost makes me yearn for the days when I got excited about raccoon sightings.

Safety first

It is midday on a Wednesday. Campus is bustling with pedestrians and vehicles trying to get to and fro. The PVTA bus I am driving is packed like one of those clown cars in the circus. The way the passengers are jammed together would be considered indecent in any other setting. At Transit, we call it an overload.

With the safety of my passengers of paramount importance, I navigate my bus through campus. As I am working my way toward the Morrill bus stop, I see a student on the sidewalk looking like she is waiting for an opportune time to cross the street. Suddenly, unexpectedly, she saunters out in front of the moving bus. "What the..." screams through my mind as I simultaneously try not to panic, to stop the bus on time so as not to turn her into road-kill, and to prevent the 75 people on my bus from becoming projectile missiles.

> I simultaneously try not to panic, to stop the bus on time so as not to turn her into road-kill, and to prevent the 75 people on my bus from becoming projectile missiles.
> Eddie Schiffman

It is a bus driver's worst nightmare come true! Passengers standing next to me see the scene unfolding and gasp in horror. Time seems to be suspended as the bus laboriously slows and stops just inches from her. Daggers shoot at me from her hatred-filled eyes as she gives me an indignant look that would have turned Medusa herself to stone.

Road rage wells up inside of me, lets of steam are spewing from my ears and nostrils. At that moment, you could have fried an egg on my forehead. Fortunately — miraculously — nobody got hurt.

Yes, she was in a crosswalk and I know the law says "vehicles must yield to pedestrians in crosswalk." –But this law does not give license to practice indiscriminate pedestrianism. As someone who drives through campus all the time, I am alarmed by the frequency of drivers being taken by surprise as pedestrians cross the street with little regard for their own safety, or the safety of others.

A bus cannot stop as quickly as a car, and a bus loaded with passengers takes even longer to stop. When someone carelessly steps in front of a bus, they not only endanger their own safety, but also the safety of everyone aboard the bus. Please, use common sense and look before crossing.

Most need not read this paragraph, but for that small minority of disaffected pedestrians, here are the instructions on how to cross a street, as taught to me by my mom when I was about four or five years old. Stand on the sidewalk and stay out of traffic. Look to the left, then to the right, then to the left a second time. Then, and only then, if it is safe to do so, proceed across the street carefully.

True scenario number two: I'm driving my bus up Main Street toward Amherst Center and the traffic light turns red. I come to a stop and wait to turn right. I see them approaching the bus, but hope they're not going to try what I think they are going to try. They do. It is three guys knocking on the door wanting to get on the bus while I'm stopped at the intersection.

Unfortunately, this is not the first time I've gone through the awkward charade of having to tell passenger–wannabes (through a closed door) that they can't get on if the bus is not at a bus stop. "Aw, c'mon!" says one. I point in the direction of the post office and say "Go to the bus stop." They cop an attitude and become belligerent. The light turns green. They start shouting obscenities. I begin to drive away, leaving them behind. Their temper tantrums continue, and one of them kicks the moving bus. How mature.

Sure. I could have just opened the door and let them on. But there is a reason why we bus drivers do not do this, and it has nothing to do with deriving sadistic pleasures out of seeing people disappointed and upset. It comes down to two reasons: safety for passengers and covering our butts.

Taking a look at a "worst case scenario" using the aforementioned experience, I give in and open the door for the unlawful passenger–wannabes. As they're climbing aboard, someone already on the bus reasons, "If they can get on here, then I can get off."

It is pandemonium, anarchy; rules have fallen by the wayside. Anything goes! He laughs in the face of the rigid PVTA protocol. At this moment, he swaggers off the bus and directly into the path of a bicyclist racing alongside the queue of traffic. The biker, taken by surprise, is unable to stop in time and collides with Mr. "I get off the bus whenever I want to."

Guess who is held personally responsible — me. I wasn't in a bus stop. Injured people are strewn about the street because I thought I was doing a "favor" for passengers. Not exactly the kind of thing I want to live with.

If you want customized transportation services, call a cab. Otherwise, follow the procedures that have helped make UMass Transit one of the finest public transportation services available. In case you're unsure, these procedures are as follows: You wait at the PVTA marked bus stop. I pull over and let you on. You ride the bus, then get off at another PVTA marked bus stop.

The bottom line is: safety first. As a bus driver, I want to provide a safe, responsible service for the community. But it takes two to tango. Unfortunately, similar versions of these incidents occur routinely, and while most are not as dramatic as what I've described, they all erode from the overall PVTA experience. When it comes to safety, everyone is responsible.

Rescue for homeless animals

To the editor:

Pooh and Piglet have found a home. From the bonding experience of bottle feeding the two kittens to retrieving their playful sparring, the process of adopting them has been rewarding for me.

I am a volunteer for P.E.T.S. (Placement, Education, Treatment, and Shelter), a non–profit organization that rescues abandoned or homeless animals. The cats we have are taken from their feral mother and need constant care. My area in particular has fisher cats, bears, and coyotes in the woods. So the cats need to stay inside.

P.E.T.S. is in need of people to provide foster homes for abandoned and homeless animals. The main cost is food and shelter for them, and a little time to give and receive love from them and to them. For information on how to help homeless animals, call the P.E.T.S. hotline at 253–9675 or 253–7934. Tax deductible contributions can be mailed to P.E.T.S: P.O. Box 2273, Amherst, MA 01004.

Real success requires work

To the editor:

I was shocked and appalled when I read Mark Griffin's self–absorbed article on why the Honors' College is good... for him. I also take "an active part in the development of this prestigious college" as a peer advisor, a job I have held for two years and take very seriously. I, however, bring one to strive for open–mindedness, can see both sides of the story.

While I love the Honors Program, and have learned much from my experiences there, I have friends who are graduating and could not take advantage of the services offered (or various) reasons. They feel left out, slighted, and deprived of extras, by the elite system that the Honors Program is sometimes accused of being.

And these are smart people, who have done wonderful things while here at UMass. They are not ashamed to tell their friends from Harvard and Brown where they go to school. They don't have to hide behind the "prestige" of the Commonwealth College to make them feel better about themselves.

As for Griffin's portrayal of the average Honors Program staffer as a whiny, misinformed, self–interested snob, I would only like to defend myself and the staff with whom I work. Though the Honors Program is not perfect, I try my hardest to treat every student that comes in to see me with respect, understanding, and an open mind (as do my coworkers). I never turn anyone away (regardless of their Honors status) and I always treat students' problems with the utmost care. If you are interested in joining the program, I am more than willing to talk about it with you.

Obviously Griffin doesn't take his work in the Honors office very seriously. The Honors Program is a way to assist students in their education, just like any other advising service on campus. It is not a place to weed out leaders from ditch diggers. I would hate for Griffin and like–minded students to think success in the real world requires so little effort. It is, after all, the result of life experience, not a few Latin words on your diploma, which will determine what you can attain in the future.

Is it time to send a woman to the White House?

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Correspondent

Is it possible that a woman could successfully run for the presidency within the next decade? Senator Susan McLane thinks it is.

Senator McLane was one of three panelists at the "Making a Difference: Women in Politics" symposium held at Mount Holyoke College last Thursday evening. Addressing a crowd of more than 100 students, most of them women, she related some of her experiences as a New Hampshire State Senator.

"I went in because the top structure was inadequate and unfair," McLane said. "I suddenly learned that women may not be brighter than men, but they dare say 'I don't know.' This different attitude probably comes from an inferiority complex, but in the end it really does matter in the legislature."

She also shared some witty advice.

"If you want to be in politics, you must wear big round earrings. Dangly ones are bad — they bring the eye down [to the chest] and that's no good," said Sen. McLane.

Sen. McLane was joined on the panel by Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University, and Senators Susan Longely from Maine and Linda Melcorian from Massachusetts. Together they presented a contradictory picture of women in politics.

According to a report published by the Center for the American Women and Politics (CAWP), women currently constitute nine of 100 U.S. senators, 63 of 435 U.S. representatives, and three of 50 governors. Overall, 1,843 individuals have served in the U.S. Senate, only 26 of whom have been women, and 9,643 individuals have served in the U.S. House, only 190 of whom have been women.

In addition, the report states that of the 63 women serving in the 105th Congress, 17 (27%) are women of color. It notes that although women comprise 52 percent of the population, only 21.8 percent of the 7,424 state legislators in the United States are women.

> "But will the vote be enough to elect a woman president by the year 2008?"

"If we pride ourselves on being a representative democracy," Sen. Longely said. "We must represent more women, blacks, and minorities."

Senators Longely and Melcorian discussed some of the economic obstacles women face when seeking public office.

"There is less access to money for women," Sen. Melcorian said. "We don't get the advantage of the political machine that gets the vote out."

According to Sen. Longely, 50 percent of female headed homes live in poverty, compared to six percent of male headed homes.

"Economics is a very real factor," she said. "Disparities are there, equities are not."

Despite these obstacles, the panelists encouraged members of the crowd to get involved in politics, and stressed the contributions women make to the political process.

According to Sen. Melcorian, women approach legislation differently than men. She said that women work to build consensus, determine the real issues, and find viable solutions.

"Women are better advocates of issues that effect their lives and families," she said. "They use their position to raise the profile of women's issues."

Sen. Longely acknowledged that female voters can make a significant difference in the political process. According to the CAWP report, women have provided the margin of victory for 47 winning candidates in senate and gubernatorial races within the past seven election cycles.

But will the vote be enough to elect a woman president by the year 2008? Research commissioned by The White House Project shows that 76 percent of Americans are ready to elect a woman as president but have not had the opportunity to do so.

The White House Project is a non–partisan public awareness campaign whose mission is to create a climate in American politics that will allow a qualified woman to successfully run for Presidency within the next decade.

"It is time to bring balance to our democracy," said Barbara Lee, board chair of The White House Project. "We are working toward the day when it is commonplace for women to run for the presidency. Letting Americans know that we have many talented, qualified women who fit the bill is the first step."

As part of the symposium last Thursday, Sen. McLane passed out ballots with the name and biographies of 20 women who come from a variety of fields and backgrounds.

Ballots will appear in issues of Parade, Glamour, Jane, Essence, Latina, and People magazines, giving people the opportunity to vote for five of the women on the ballot who they believe have the potential to lead the country.

Edwidge Danticat speaks about Haiti

Shirley Bruno

I would like to say sak passe to all my beautiful Haitian brothers and sisters here at UMass. My, aren't we looking lovely today, in our yellow, honey, and ebony complexions. Haven't we sojourned such a way, through a thorned and narrowed path for our own independence? Wasn't it a long and tiresome swim across the Caribbean Sea to arrive on the unwelcoming US shores?

Didn't we grow so much in defining our identity, from the Fugees in popular music, to critically acclaimed writers like Edwidge Danticat? We are a proud people from a rich and complex culture and we wear the historical wounds and scars to prove it. But I ask, do we remember how we were able to nurse those wounds into badges of courage?

Of course, we all pay homage to the Fathers of Independence of Haiti: Toussaint L'overture, Jean–lacques Dessalines, and Henri Christophe, who led the first and most successful slave revolution of all time during the 19th century. But how many really know and understand the weight of our historical pagnes and victories?

How many of us realize how deep the caste system–mentality and the tension between the neighboring country of the Dominican Republic traces back in the history of Haiti? Do you know any of the strong women fighting alongside every strong Haitian man for Haiti's independence, power, and democracy?

We claim to be proud Haitians but many of us do not know about some of the most monumental turning points that have shaped our culture. Sorry, but we cannot blame our ignorance soley on biased, vague history books and lessons despite the euro–andocentric minds behind them. The stories are there. Maybe they aren't spread neatly on the black and white pages of history texts but they are written vividly in our literature and in our lives.

"Don't wait for facts about Haiti to spread, go and find them out yourself, they are waiting to be discovered."

Those were the words Haitian American novelist Edwidge Danticat spoke to me after her book reading at Mount Holyoke College on Friday, October 2. Her advice is not only directed to me, she is speaking to every Haitian American struggling to search for self and culture. Danticat spoke about how the image of Haiti is beginning to evolve as a positive one for other cultures as well as for Haitians themselves. But we cannot get caught up in the surface alone, our past is much deeper.

The words of Edwidge Danticat are deep. She speaks with a certain calming reverence, like she is older beyond her years. And in some ways she is. At the ripe age of twenty–nine, she has graduated from Barnard College, received an M.F.A. from Brown University in creative writing, written three widely acclaimed novels, and has experienced the treacherous life between the dual cultures of our extended families. Danticat went further to break boundaries by telling this story through a woman carrying the heavy burdens of being poor, Haitian, and female.

Danticat's other books, Breath, Eyes, and Memory, and Krik, Krak, are all about breaking boundaries and finding ourselves through our Haitian past. Her books are all painful journeys into the inhumanity of poverty, the oppression of women, and the silence of our past.

Through her powerful books, filled with imagery and historical truth, she clearly wears her wounds like badges of honor. Some of us need to take that journey into our past to affirm the future of our self and culture as well.

Women's Perspective

So you want to call him. You know, the one you just broke up with. You pick up the phone and as it rings you say to yourself, "why am I calling someone who put me through so much pain?" He never initiated any actions towards showing you how much you were appreciated. He may have bought you roses, even a diamond ring, yet those were just token symbols that he thought he'd smooth you over with.

Forgetting that the phone was on the fourth ring, he picks up and says "Hello," (with his baritone voice). You feel that sensual side of you saying, "It's OK, talk to him it's just a phone call." But inwardly you want him to say how much of a fool he was for not knowing what a jewel he had before him. You want to yell, perhaps use profanity, because the anger within you is so strong. Yet the soft and sensual side of you allows you to hold your pain.

"Hello," he says for the third time. You hang up. For some reason that small action made you feel powerful. The simple fact that you didn't say anything, allowed you to feel In control. You toil within to once again call him and hang up, but you pause, because you realize through your thirty seconds of glory, you still feel cheated.

You tell yourself that you're over him. That you just wanted to call to let him know how much of a better person you are, now that he's out of your life. You feel a warm tear trickle from your eyes and then to your cheek. With your blurred vision you start to reassess the whole relationship. You look into the mirror and stare at yourself. The thought of cutting your hair, dying it or going clothes shopping sounds like something that would make you feel better.

Allana E. Todman

"Am I pretty?" you ask yourself three million times, as if external beauty is all that counts. Never questioning what you received, you think about all of the giving that allowed you to lose a piece of yourself.

Inhaling a deep breath, you pick up your teddy bear that lays so nicely on the bed. You hug it, trying to remember the hugs you once shared with your ex. The difference between the teddy bear's cuddle and the memory of your mates, is that you know there's no regrets afterwards.

Finally your somber moments of thinking which all started with the picking up of the phone end. You get some candles and light them. You notice that like the flame burns, you too must continue to live, not allowing the flame to burn out. You awaken the next morning and realize he (your ex) still has something of yours. The space that you keep in your mind to think about all of the bad times. You reassess, take two inhales of breath, and one day hope that you can pick up the phone to call someone that only causes you to smile.

The Tempest: gender views in 1600s

Erin Dunham

To assume what instigated or triggered Shakespeare to write The Tempest, is clearly unknown without proper documentation. Though researchers and "Shakespeare gurus" offer the most possible interpretation, one can not be sure. A researcher or guru I am not, but I am merely capable of making a connection between the plight of women in the early 1600s and a striving playwright attempting to vocalize the dilemmas of society through comedy, drama, etc. As a result, I propose this theory concerning the message Shakespeare hoped to send to his viewers — the mistreatment and disregarded Intelligence of women in the 1600s.

Miranda, the central female in the play, is presented as being rather naive and innocent. Since she was raised by her father, one can assume the manipulated etiquette he instilled in her in regards to males. For example, Miranda speaks little, giving possible origins to the phrase "women should be seen and not heard." In addition, Miranda's attention span is challenged upon the description of hers and her father's past, and she is maneuvered to marry the first man she meets.

Caliban, wretched slave of Prospero (Miranda's father), attempted to maliciously capture Miranda's virginity. Though Prospero distributed the proper punishment for this evil effort, It was merely to sustain his daughter's purity. The possible consequences that would have affected her well being and emotional stability were not considered. As a result, this event exemplifies the Initial mistreatment of women and displaced concern.

Ferdinand, prince of Naples (and arranged husband for Miranda), exerts his masculinity while lifting logs. It was traditional in that day for the man to engage in labor unfit for women. Miranda does offer her assistance to Ferdinand, due to his weary countenance, but her proposal Is declined. The refusal is due to the pursuit of male honor, but this situation could represent the woman attempting to prove her physical capabilities outside the kitchen.

In the 1600s, the relationship between father and daughter was wrong to the degree that daughters must honor and respect their paternal figure unconditionally. This is instilled upon the daughter where she is taught how to behave toward her husband. Prospero is the only man she encounters until she is ripe for marriage. Such solitary exposure could symbolize the daughter's solidarity to her father before she is to be married off.

"How beauteous mankind is!," exclaims Miranda after encountering a slew of males. Prospero responds to his daughter's mystification with "Tis new to thee." In this instance, Prospero may represent Shakespeare himself. With this retort interpreted sarcastically, one can acknowledge the irony in saying that mankind emits beauty (mankind will never be beautiful until it respects, on the same level as men, women). Thus reiterating Shakespeare's awareness that society in the 1600s was controversial in terms of gender and certainly not something to gawk at or admire.

UHS to inform all students on eating disorders

By Whitney Mizell
Collegian Correspondent

Allie, 21, has been anorexic since the age of 16. For her, anorexia was a mode of control because she had always been perfection oriented. It was also her way of dealing with the fact that her sister is manic depressive.

"It's important to understand an eating disorder is a way to express something that a person has not been able to express. And the first thing is to get past the eating disorder and find out what it really is about," said Tam, Allie's mother.

Eating disorders affect 8 million people in the United States alone. Ninety percent of them are women and 6 percent will die from one. Those that are fortunate enough to get help and enter recovery will battle against the disorder for the rest of their lives.

> "One major concern is the students living on campus with the meal plan."

The facts on eating disorders were discussed at an informational meeting led by Sydney Flum, clinical nutritionist at University Health Services. A video entitled, Pressure on Campus was shown, and it contained personal stories of local men, women, and doctors who have been dealing with these issues.

In the past, the center for eating disorders has been run by students, psychologists, nutritionists, nurse practitioners and doctors in the form of a drop in service. This year, however, the center is taking a new approach. In addition to drop in service, the workers and volunteers have decided to hold one informational session each month during the semester to increase people's awareness. The meetings touch on some harsh issues that are quite saddening and often difficult to deal with.

Typically, the various experts on eating disorders at UHS work as a large team for each individual patient. Together they work out and design an individualized plan for each patient. Flum said, "every case is as different as the patient. It's more of an art to be able to design a plan than a science."

While mostly females suffer, eating disorders are increasing among men. They are primarily seen in male athletes involved in wrestling, skating or dancing as well as among the homosexual population.

In addition, Flum said that an eating disorder is often a way for people to deal with other hidden issues such as abuse, depression, stress or pressure. That is why it is possible for a person to develop a drug or an alcohol problem as well, she added.

One of the main objectives of the monthly meetings is to provide information on how to eat well. One major concern is the students living on campus with the meal plan. As voiced by one attendant, Holly Hoshimoto, "everything in the cafeteria is fried and it's extremely difficult to eat healthy, receive enough nutrients that are required daily, and feel satisfied."

> "Recovery is a long road. It's going to be there forever, but it's much better to be a recovering anorexic than an anorexic."

Flum suggested finding the cafeteria with the best salad bar, the best potato bar, etc. and going from building to building to find nutritious food that will also satisfy. She added that once in a while it won't hurt to eat the other, less healthy foods.

However, students under treatment for an eating disorder who want to get off the meal plan are required to meet with Flum so she can evaluate whether or not the student would still be able to meet nutritional requirements.

Clinical nutritionist, Robin Levine, compared an eating disorder to a person drowning on a tiny life raft. In order to help the person, to give them a better raft to cling onto, they must trust you. Furthermore they must be ready to let go of their raft and reach out for a new one. Obviously this can be both frightening and difficult for a person.

Eating disorders are dangerous and they have the potential to kill or leave a person with serious health problems. Effects range from dizziness and headaches to hair loss, loss of bone density, intestinal problems, and stomach rupture. Unfortunately, most of these effects are permanent.

As for Allie, she has been in recovery for one year and said, "recovery is a long road. It's going to be there forever, but it's much better to be a recovering anorexic than an anorexic."

The next sessions will be held Oct. 20, Nov. 4, and Dec. 1 in room 302 at University Health Services from 4–5:30 p.m. Everyone interested is strongly encouraged to attend.

The Legendary Pink Dots frighten and delight on their latest release Nemesis Online.

NEMESIS ONLINE
Legendary Pink Dots

The best art-rock is not to everyone's immediate liking. It usually takes some getting used to and a penchant for bizzare sounds. It has a wide range of influences to choose from. It is lauded as inventive music by some, loathed as "is this music?" by others.

Enter the Legendary Pink Dots. Since their birth in London in 1980, core members Edward Ka-Spel and Phil "The Silverman" Knight have defied formulas, crossed boundaries and have created something that was very new and very odd. Think David Lynch meets The Cure, or better yet Bauhaus meets Syd Barrett.

Through their move to Amsterdam (where LPD's largest fan base is) in 1984, and the departure of band members April Ilfife and Mick Marshal, the Legendary Pink Dots have had over 30 members come and go and have released more albums than they can remember (last count was somewhere around 40). The latest release from the Legendary Pink Dots, Nemesis Online, continues in their experimental, spooky tradition that characterized such albums as 1983's Curse. Now, with the band consisting of The Prophet Ola Sepel (Edward Ka-Spel), The Silverman, Niles Van Hornblower, Ryan Moore, Frank Verchuuren and Edwin ("Atwyn") Von Trippenhof, Nemesis Online does not paint the band in an entirely new direction, unless, of course, that direction is up.

"Dissonance," the first track off the album has the perfect title. The funky atmospheric bassline and the apocalyptic lyrics set the tone of the album right away — dark and bleak. "Jase" NOL's second track emits a "Twin Peaks"-ish feel with synthesizer experimentation thrown in. Things get more poppy with "As Long as it's Purple and Green." The dreary lyrics — "there's a riot in the cell block... bugs are sliding down the phone/mutating sores and spores and shellshock-virus Martha hunts alone"— sound interesting and cryptic, even more so with Ola Sepel's twisted vocals.

"Ghost" is one of the creepiest songs off Nemesis Online. The haunting chant of "blood on the floor/blood on the

These Dreams too hollow

Williams can't save spiritual film

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

WHAT DREAMS MAY COME
Directed by Vincent Ward with Robin Williams, Annabella Sciorra, Cuba Gooding Jr.
Playing at Mountain Farms Cinemas

What Dreams May Come begins with the form of a hero's journey into the underworld and then revisions it through the lens of Hollywood schmaltz.

The movie is tear-jerking and occasionally beautiful, especially some eerie, hypnotic editing and sharp special effects that turn a painting into a landscape. At its core, however, What Dreams May Come is a hollow exercise in American pop-spirituality. It has no soul.

The story begins when our subtly named hero Christy (Robin Williams) bumps into a girl on a lake and falls in love.

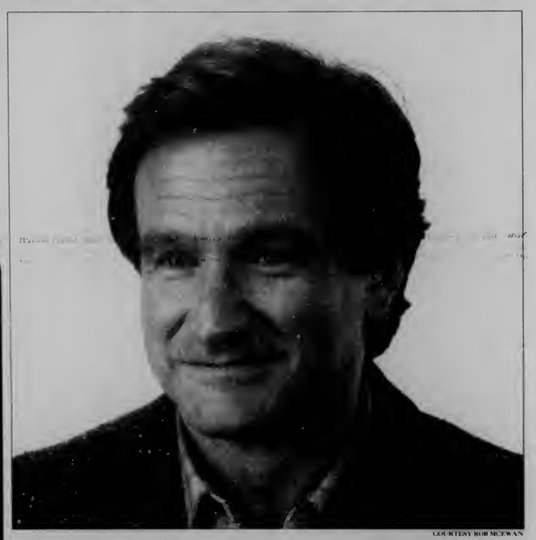
Christy and his new love Annie (Annabella Sciorra) soon realize that they are soulmates. In the space of five minutes on screen they have married and lost two children in an auto accident. Annie falls into a deep depression, which Christy pulls her out of only to die himself in another crash years later. Christy rises to his own personal heaven, a painting of Annie's made real.

Almost immediately, he receives word that Annie has killed herself and, like all suicides (as the movie tells us in one of many instances of post-Freudian mumbo-jumbo posing for logic), that she is imprisoned in her own mind, forever locked away from him. The last half of the movie is Christy's search for her.

The plot is rushed, but still pretty interesting. The problem is that none of the characters are compelling. Christy, in particular, is overly sentimental and paper thin. Williams' hyper, cerebral comic style serves complicated characters well, but as Ivory-soap- cover-model Christy he seems alternately bored and strained. Cuba Gooding, Jr. and Annabella Sciorra do slightly better with their smaller parts, projecting both mystery and sadness, but the depth in their characters is all in the acting. The script unfailingly aims for the obvious.

An even greater miscalculation in What Dreams May Come is its oversimplification of such dense, tangled forests of ideas like family and madness.

Christy is purer than snow and his family is cute and bland. Annie's depression and anguish are treated like broken limbs that a few kind words from Christy can heal. Why doesn't Christy have demons of his own to fight? Why is a brilliant woman like Annie always so helpless?



The movie's evocation of the afterlife is questionable at best. First, the movie's characters trade races in the afterlife, a well-intentioned gesture that ends up implying that race is no factor in a person's soul, a very debatable point.

Second, everyone in the afterlife speaks English, even in hell. That's a little convenient.

Third, the afterlife depends on imagination and self-forgiveness, tossing out centuries of fertile religious history in favor of a confusing "holy psychiatry." Heaven is pretty and relaxing but not sacred. It is no more than the ultimate summer vacation.

What Dreams May Come is a Hollywood fantasy of the great chain of being: have a family, be normal, believe in romantic love above all else and after you die you will get a boat and a lake to sail it on.

The movie's heaven is where "perfect" families in sitcoms and car dealership commercials go when they die. But what about the rest of us? C–

COURTESY LISA JOHNSON

The ska silliness of Reel Big Fish, led by Aaron Barrett (bottom right), brought their energized act to Pearl St. Sunday night.

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

REEL BIG FISH
Pearl St.
Oct. 4

The rise of ska may be commercially attributed to The Mighty Mighty Bosstones, but it is the less visible bands which have most recently kept the genre running strong. Reel Big Fish belongs somewhere in the middle, noted for their sarcastic antics and songs such as "She Has a Girlfriend Now" but not exactly self-fledged stars, even after (or perhaps because of) their cameo in the "South Park" boys' BASEketball.

But when it comes to being unique, rousing an audience, or yelling at ex-girlfriends, Reel Big Fish has no equal. Their hour and a half set at a semi-crowded Pearl Street Ballroom Sunday night was marked by their usual high energy and rabid banter, in celebration of their soon-to-be released new album, Why Do They Rock So Hard?, due out October 20.

Perhaps it was a blessing that the band only played four songs from this album-on-the-horizon, because the sample they offered was less than exciting. Drowned in banal ska rhythms and nothing to catch the ear, the new stuff sounds entirely too safe and much too repetitive. Luckily, though, Reel Big Fish have an impeccable tendency to make the uninteresting interesting, and as drummer Andrew Gonzales left his set to come out front and croon "I Want Your Girlfriend," the superficiality of the latest offerings didn't matter much.

Relying instead on their gone gold debut CD, Turn the Radio Off, the band created a furied frenzy and carried the mostly Fishdevotee-crowd effortlessly. Opening with "Alternative, Baby" and really getting started with "Trendy," the suburban septet got into their groove quickly and never wavered, except to provoke the crowd and promote their new album.

"I'll Never Be" and "Snoop Dog, Baby" were performed efficiently, but it was the college-themed rantings of "Beer" that got the audience hooked. Just before "Beer," the band did their famous cover of A-Ha's "Take On Me." Reel Big Fish is perhaps the only group that could take the poppiest of 80's pop songs (and the best video of all time) and make it a ska-fest of different rhythms and fast-paced melodies.

And just when their energy seemed to be fading, the band regrouped and called up audience members for perhaps their best-known number, "She's Got a Girlfriend Now." Musically, it wasn't their best job, but nothing can beat a fan in a helmet screaming out the catchy chorus. Only a small venue like Pearl Street can make for such intimate moments as this.

Decked out in his usual flowered shirt and slicked back, Ace Ventura hair, band front man Aaron Barrett kept things in control while never ceasing to create some madness. And although there was surprisingly no encore, their closing with "Sell Out" was nonetheless a perfect and rousing ending. Let's just hope there's some stuff on the new album like this, or Reel Big Fish won't be rocking hard for long.

Opening punk band Frenzal Rhomb were highlighted by the fact that they were incomprehensible and completely horrible, but co-opener Spring Heeled Jack, with their mix of ska and punk and muscled silliness, got things started a little better.

two and three and was very successful." Manchester's play against Vermont demonstrated a much more focused attack than his matches against MIT.

The Minutemen swept the Catamounts in doubles play with the pair of Todd Cheney and Parsa Samii winning 8–2, and the combo of Fabian Rabanal and Eric Reblin also proving victorious with an 8–4 win.

Dixon was pleased to see her doubles teams bounce back from a disappointing showing against MIT.

"Today we had very good number one doubles," Dixon said. "They are very talented and I am glad to see them get."

Both Manchester and Navarro showed great poise and execution, returning volleys that left their opponents frozen.

Equally as impressive for the Massachusetts team was the inspired play of Fabian Rabanal. Rabanal lifted the whole atmosphere of the match with some spectacular lunging and diving plays that led to UMass points.

"I continue to be impressed with Fabian's scrappiness at the number three seed," Dixon said. "He is a fighter on the court."

Despite the conclusive victory, there are still some things that need to be worked on.

"I thought we were sloppy," Dixon said. "I felt we needed a more impressive victory over Vermont."

Manchester agreed saying that "this is a team that we can not lose to."

Dixon hopes to use the week off to prepare the team for the upcoming road trip.

"We cannot look to the other team to make us better. We must make ourselves better," Dixon said.

These two early home contests are of great importance since the majority of the remaining games will be spent on the road.

"These matches are hugely important," Dixon said. "Especially with a young team, I can pull them together and focus them better than when we are on the road. It is a really good way for us to start the year at home, with the fans."

NFL team problems are unveiled

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

Unnoticed in San Francisco's 3-0 start was the fact that the 49ers had flaws.

Yes, they were averaging an unheard of 544 yards and 37 points a game. But they also were next to last in defense, allowing 405 yards.

So it probably shouldn't have been a surprise that Buffalo beat them Sunday. And clearly it was no surprise the unbeaten Saints lost. They were defeated at home by New England.

The Dolphins went down, too. They've been 3-0 four of the last five seasons, but the Jets sent them tumbling.

A week ago, it was the Seahawks' turn. They lost 13-10 in Pittsburgh after routing Philadelphia. Arizona and Washington. In Buffalo, the 49ers committed 22 penalties for 178 yards. They did come back from a 23-0 deficit with three fourth-quarter TDs, but were finally done in by their last penalty — offside on an onside kick they recovered.

Penalties weren't the only problem.

Jamie Brown, who had a troubled training and lost his left tackle job to Dave Fiore, had a difficult time filling in for the injured Fiore against Bruce Smith. Smith ended up with a sack and four pressures on Steve Young.

There also are problems in the secondary, where Antonio Langham is either getting beat or getting flagged. The free-agent flip-flop — Langham from Baltimore to the 49ers and Rod Woodson to the Ravens — isn't working out as San Francisco had hoped.

Coach Steve Mariucci doesn't quite know what to do about the penalties, some of which were stupid, such as a 15-yard body slam by safety Tim McDonald, a 12-year veteran.

"I don't think we're going to run sprints for every penalty or anything like that," Mariucci said. "But it has to be addressed."

That the Saints and Dolphins lost was less startling.

New Orleans was a one-touchdown underdog against New England despite playing at home. The Saints actually gave a good account of themselves, losing 30-27 on Adam Vinatieri's field goal in the final seconds.

That might be a major breakthrough for New England — Drew Bledsoe needs a few game-winning drives to move into the elite quarterback class.

Miami was 3-0 on running and defense. Running doesn't usually work well against Bill Parcells and Bill Belichick, who had two weeks to prepare. So the Jets limited the Dolphins to 34 yards on the ground and forced Dan Marino to pass 32 times. That exposed Miami's shortcomings at receiver — Marino completed just 15 passes for 121 yards and two interceptions, and the Jets won 20-9.

LIVING ON THE EDGE: Two years ago, the Carolina Panthers made it to the NFC title game in their second year behind a defense laden with veterans, good special teams, and a mistake-proof offense.

This season, they're 0-5 and lost 51-23 to Atlanta on Sunday. They still have veterans, some the same, some retreads (Kevin Greene) and some new ones (Greg Lloyd).

But Tim Dwight's 93-yard TD on the opening kickoff demonstrated how things have changed on special teams, and the Falcons scored two TD's off of two turnovers 22 seconds apart in the third quarter. Overall, Carolina had six turnovers.

LIVING ON THE EDGE II: Last season, the Giants won the NFC East at 10-5-1, making up for a dull offense with a solid defense and the NFL's best turnover ratio — plus-25.

This year, they're 2-3 with a turnover ratio of minus-2, including an interception by Tampa Bay's Charles Mincy that gave the Bucs what turned out to be an insurmountable 7-0 lead in their 20-3 victory.

LIVING ON THE EDGE III: The Bears, who have led at halftime in all four of their losses, finally figured out how to win — get behind. On Sunday, they overcame a 27-10 deficit to beat the Lions 31-27.

But they still have to do something about the third quarter — in five games they've been outscored 61-0.

NFC LEAST: With Arizona and Philadelphia losing to Oakland and Denver Sunday, the AFC West has a 10-1 advantage over the NFC East. The only NFC win was the Giants' 34-16 victory in San Diego a week ago. Overall, the division is 2-13 against outside opponents, the other win a 20-17 decision by the Cardinals over the Rams.

At this rate, the Cowboys win the division by default, the Giants and Cards can hang in if they stay close to 500, and the Redskins (outscored 74-169) and Eagles (52-137) are racing for the second draft pick (behind expansion Cleveland). At least they have each other to play.

NFC LEAST II: The Redskins committed $57 million in the offseason to shore up their run defense. That included signing Dana Stubblefield, last season's defensive player of the year, trading for Dan Wilkinson from Cincinnati and trading Sean Gilbert, who didn't want to play in Washington, to Carolina.

stairs/blood on the door/blood in my hair" sends chills through the speakers via Ola Sepel's muted vocals. The piano exit on "Ghost" is a perfect sample of the Legendary Pink Dots' tortured beauty. "Sunset for a Swan" is also an intriguing track. The jazzy ending and guitar experimentation easily recall Pink Floyd.

"Zoo" and "Fate's Faithful Punchline" are two of NOL's gems. The former for its electronica induced beats and bluesy saxophones, and the latter for its beautiful, mellow, low noise melodies. The album closes with "Slaughedje," which sounds like either a novelty clock store or a demonic children's toy choir.

The Legendary Pink Dots have never been afraid shattering any traditional molds they have created for themselves. As a result, each one of their albums have been significantly different while keeping in with the spirit of their previous work. Nemesis Online is easily one of the year's best, and possibly a soundtrack to the entrance of the new millennium. Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You will want to weigh the odds, assess the risks, and ultimately take a chance today. You can enjoy considerable rewards if you are more aggressive.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You can afford to be a little more generous with your time and energy today. Take care, however, that you fully understand your own motives.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Now is the time to hold back; you'll want to increase the pace; seek what you deserve. It's "your turn!"

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You needn't panic today if you feel you're not getting things done on schedule. You actually have a little "breathing room" at this time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — What you don't know can actually hurt you today — but in ways that you won't fully understand until it is too late. Use care!

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Trust your own sense of humor today. You may not understand everything that goes on around you at this time, but your perspective is valuable.

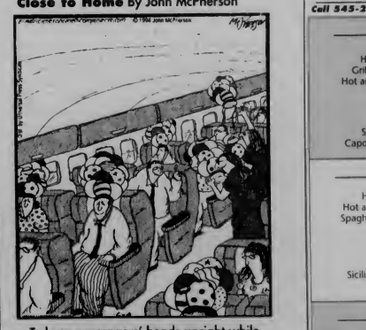
ARIES (March 21–April 19) — The most important member of your team is you — and you're not working with yourself as well as you should.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Someone is likely to call upon you to step in today where another has failed. The fact is, you are better equipped now than ever before.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may not agree with a partner — or a boss, for that matter! — on the best way to get things done today. A compromise is in order.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Don't try to "save the best for last" today, or you may find that there's no time to do the very thing you've been looking forward to.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Don't try to do everything on your own today. There is a valuable support group available to you at any time, so take advantage of it!



VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You'll have a great deal of energy and enthusiasm throughout the day. You should be able to do more than is required. Even critics applaud you.

UM men's soccer is downed again

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

After ten winless games, the Massachusetts men's soccer team officially has cause for concern. The Minutemen (0-8-2 overall, 0-2-1 Atlantic 10) headed down to Philadelphia, and came up empty in two tries, as they dropped matches to Temple and St. Joseph's.

UMass hung tough with the Owls (3-8-1 overall, 1-2-0 A-10), but fell 2-1 on Friday afternoon. After dropping that close encounter, the Minutemen had an altogether new experience, as they were done in by St. Joe's, 6-1, on Sunday afternoon.

Until that game, UMass had given its opponents battles, and appeared to be on the fringe of turning the season around.

The bottom fell out for the squad on Sunday, however, as the Minutemen, who had played well in the first half, became victim to a fifteen minute flurry of goals by the Hawks.

The game had gone into the half tied at 0-0, as neither team was really able to put together a concentrated attack.

That pattern changed drastically in a hurry as the Hawks booted the ball past junior Minuteman Todd Fowler five times in a span of eleven minutes and forty-one seconds.

"That was one of those rare times where every ball a team touched turned into a score," Massachusetts coach Sam Koch said. "Unfortunately we were on the wrong side of that."

Fowler, who has had a superb season in net despite the team's record, was unable to stop the bleeding in what turned into the most frustrating afternoon of the season.

Buddy Evers opened up the floodgates for St. Joe's at 47:16 with an unassisted goal. Freshman standout Roman Escobar was assisted by Erick Budge at 54:26, continuing the attack.

Brian Geary then scored and was followed by Escobar's second tally of the day. Rob Smith poured it on for St. Joe's as he deftly found his way through the UMass defense.

Freshman Bryan O'Quinn then relieved Fowler and consequently saw his first collegiate goaltending action for the Minutemen.

O'Quinn, entering the game with a 5-0 deficit to work with, kept the peace, but did allow Escobar to record a hat trick to the delight of the home crowd.

UMass salvaged some respect, as Bill Laporte ended the shutout attempt at 89:24 with an unassisted score.

"The only choice we have is to move on and forget about this game," Koch said. "We have a big weekend coming up, and we cannot dwell on this bad performance."

On Friday, the Minutemen lost in much less convincing fashion to Temple.

UMass trailed 2-0 at the intermission, but played good defense overall, and just missed on several scoring opportunities.

Their play early on gave them confidence heading into the second half. This positive energy quickly produced results as Matt Christy beat Temple keeper Phil Pizzano for his second goal of the season.

Unfortunately, Christy's contribution was the final goal of the game, and the Minutemen had dropped yet another close meeting, though they felt they were capable and deserving of a win.

"The Temple game should have been a win for us," Koch said. "As far as I am concerned we clearly outplayed them.

"We are not a bad team, our record really is not indicative of what we are capable of, and hopefully that will start to show."

The Minutemen will now have the rest of the week to regroup, before they head south to take on two more conference opponents in George Washington and Virginia Tech.

UM heads to URI, battles Rams tonight

By Michael Kabylanski
Collegian Staff

If there was any question as to whether or not the Atlantic 10 conference has improved since last year, the Massachusetts women's soccer team found out that the answer was a resounding yes over the weekend.

UMass (4-7, 1-1 in the A-10) split a pair of tough contests against Temple (a 2-1 loss) and St. Joseph's (a 2-1 win in double overtime). For the record, the Owls finished 5-15, 2-9 in the A-10 in 1997, while St. Joe's was 11-6-1, 6-5 in conference play. The Minutewomen, on the other hand, won the conference with a perfect 11-0 regular season mark and then went on to win the postseason tournament.

UMass will now face the team that may be the biggest surprise in the conference so far. Rhode Island, tonight in Kingston, RI. The Rams mustered only a 2-16 record last year, but are off to a 7-2 start, including a perfect 2-0 mark in the A-10.

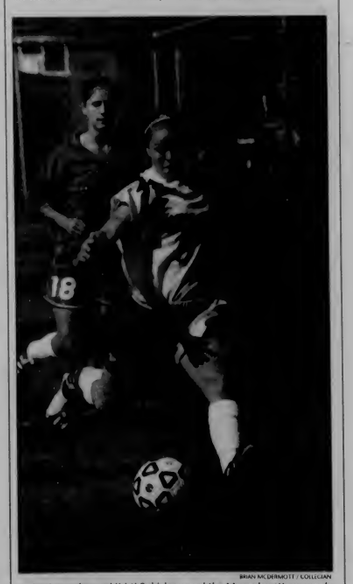
"It's going to be another good game," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

Last year's matchup between these two teams was a 7-0 victory in which the Minutewomen dominated the Rams. It may be a different story this time around, however, as Rhode Island now sports a balanced offensive attack, as well as solid goalkeeping in freshman Kate Hirsch, who already has three shutouts this season.

Offensively, Rhody coach Shelley Smith brought in a talented freshman class that is already starting to pay dividends. Forward Shannon Kittleson leads the team with eight goals and 19 points, while fellow classmate Catherine Zanni is second with 11 points.

"They have a kid from Washington (Kittleson) who is quite good and is also fast," said Rudy of URI's top threat. "That's a scary thing for us."

Others who should contribute for the Rams include junior forward Stephanie Boisvert (10 points), sophomore Mary Drapetis (nine points), and freshman Kathleen Patton (eight points).



As a sidenote, URI also played St. Joe's and Temple last weekend, beating both squads by scores of 6-0 and 3-1 respectively.

UMass is coming off an emotional 2-1 double-overtime win over St. Joe's on Sunday. The Minutewomen controlled the tempo against the Hawks as well as in last Friday's loss to Temple. On both occasions, however, UMass had trouble finishing on scoring opportunities and will look to break out with some tonight.

"We're just not finishing right now," said junior forward Emma Kurowski, who tallied the game-winner on Sunday. "And St. Joe's packed their defense, so it was tough to even get a shot off.

"We should've scored more goals (against St. Joe's), but we hustled the whole game and deserved to win," said sophomore Kara Green, who set up Kurowski's game- winner and also scored UMass' first goal on Sunday.

Game time is slated for 7 p.m. at the URI Soccer Complex.

UM tennis teams take wins at home

Men playing well so far

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's tennis team remained perfect on the season with a decisive 5-2 victory over the University of Vermont last Friday. The win improved the Minutemen to 2-0 on the year and gives them two solid home victories to build upon before taking to the road.

UMass number one seed Rob Manchester rebounded from a tough outing against the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with a fine performance. Manchester was dominating in his singles match, winning in straight sets 6-3, 6-1. He was equally as impressive in his doubles match with partner Bo Navarro, dismissing the UVM number one doubles 8-0.

Head coach Judy Dixon was pleased with Manchester's performance.

"I am glad for Robbie. I said he was lacking confidence. This win puts him on track," Dixon said. "The only way to get confidence is to win."

Manchester also noted the importance of his victories.

"I played considerably better [today] than I have been playing. I needed to get a win under me. This is a new slot for me at number one. At number one you will always be playing a good player."

Adjusting to his new position on the team has proven to be a rough transition.

"Losing has been tough for me," said Manchester. "Last year I played at

Minutewomen earn No. 1

By Jenn Gaylord
Collegian Correspondent

Well, you win some and you lose some. This past Saturday, the Massachusetts women's tennis team won their first match of the season. And to top it off, it was their only home match.

Last Wednesday, the team discovered why Dartmouth is ranked 75th in the country when it comes to women's tennis. The Minutewomen were shut out by the Big Green with a score of 9-0.

The singles matches resulted in some very disappointing losses. In the No. one match, Dartmouth's Rebecca Dirksen beat UMass junior Ola Gerasimova with scores of 6-3, 2-6, and 6-4. UMass' senior co-captain Jackie Braunstein was defeated by Michelle Dray of Dartmouth with scores of 6-3 and 6-3 in the No. two match. Freshman Helena Horak of UMass was defeated in the No. three match by Dartmouth's Taff, while another UMass freshman Annie Hamilton lost to Dartmouth's Yardi in the No. four match.

UMass sophomore Robyn Lebovitz lost the No. five match to Dartmouth's Jenny Lange by scores of 2-6, 6-4, and 6-4. Ali Tross was defeated by Smalley of Dartmouth in the No. six match, and the other UMass senior co-captain, Gillian Kane, was beaten by Dartmouth's Carly Bashlichen 6-2, 6-0 in No. seven singles play.

The doubles matches against Dartmouth were just as disappointing as the singles. Dirksen and Taff beat the No. one doubles, Gerasimova and Horak by a score of 9-7. Braunstein and Hamilton, the No. two doubles, lost to Lange and Yardi by a score of 8-0. Bray and Smalley, No. three doubles, defeated Lebovitz and Tross, 8-6.

While Monday was a disappointing loss, Wednesday was the complete opposite, featuring the first win of the season for the Minutewomen. Massachusetts defeated the Red Storm of St. John's University by a score of 7-2, winning in the No.'s two, three, four, five, and six singles matches and the numbers two and three doubles matches. The win improves the Minutewomen's record to 1-2 on the fall season.

In the No. one singles, Gerasimova lost by scores of 2-6, 6-3, 7-6, (8-6) to St. John's Elena Bantovska. Braunstein defeated Corina Cetateanu of St. John's in the No. two singles by scores of 6-4, 7-6, (8-6). Horak won the No. three singles Lebovitz and Hamilton won numbers four and five, respectively, by a score of 6-0, 6-0. Number six singles, Tross, defeated Mirela Bianam of St. John's University 6-0, 6-1.

The doubles against St. John's were just as fruitful. Lebovitz and Horak defeated St. John's Cetateanu and Jackson in the No. two doubles with a score of 8-5. This win was the second of the day for both Lebovitz and Horak. They each had success in their respective singles matches. Braunstein and Kane also were won their doubles competition by a score of 8-0. The only loss in the doubles matches came at the hands of the No. one team of St. John's, Bantovska and Efstathion, who defeated Gerasimova and Hamilton by scores of 9-8, 8-3.

The women's tennis coach, Judy Dixon, was unavailable for comment.

The tennis team will go on the road again to face UConn Huskies at 12 p.m. on Saturday afternoon in Storrs.

UMass wins three but sustains two big losses

By Alexander Wood
Collegian Correspondent

The 13th ranked Massachusetts' men's water polo team managed to sweep the North/South Challenge last weekend and extend their winning streak to nine games, but not without suffering two big losses at the same time.

After defeating Harvard 14-4 and 12th ranked Navy 13-9, the Minutemen then defeated 11th ranked Queens 11-7, in what would end up being a costly victory that coach Russ Yarworth described as "shameless, cowardly, and despicable."

UMass lost two of its three All-American players when seniors Brian Stahl and Aldo Roman were injured by punches thrown by Queens players. Stahl was the first Minuteman to go down, as he was taken to the hospital with severe throat lacerations and a cut from his upper lip to his nose. Three minutes later Roman was hit in the eye and carted off to the hospital where he received five sutures above his left eye and was having a hard time focusing his vision.

After the second attack the teams were taken out of the pool and sent to their respective bench areas, where there was, "a lot of yelling, but we never left our bench area..." Yarworth said.

The referees then called the game on account of the situation being too volatile to continue. The Minutemen are scheduled to be back in action next weekend in another CWPA League Tournament, in which they are supposed to face-off again with Queens. Yarworth is currently writing his account of the incident.

"Obviously the situation is going to be reviewed by the league offices," he said.

The status of leading scorers Stahl and Roman, both in the middle of impressive senior campaigns, for next weekend's action is at best uncertain, as Roman is still suffering from blurred vision. Yarworth remains optimistic for next weekend's action.

"I love the kids. Through adversity comes strength. This is certainly going to be a rallying point for them." Yarworth said.

Despite the two key losses, UMass is still on a roll. The injuries cast a cloud over an otherwise very successful weekend. The sweep boosts the Minutemen record to 12-1 overall, and the victories over Navy and Queens (the team responsible for Massachusetts' only loss) were big steps forward and showed that UMass is a force to be reckoned with. However, the loss of Stahl and Roman is a fact that the Minutemen will now have to face.

"It was a had day for water polo and for UMass in particular. But we came away with the win if you want to look at the bright side," Yarworth said. "There's no room in sport or water polo for this behavior."

Filipino court acquits Marcos on graft charge

MANILA, Philippines (AP) — The Philippine Supreme Court acquitted former first lady Imelda Marcos of corruption yesterday, saving her from a 12-year jail term and overturning the only case in which she had been found guilty of graft during her late husband's rule.

The court ruled 8-5, with one judge abstaining, to acquit the widow of former President Ferdinand Marcos.

"Thank God, once again the system works. Justice prevailed," Marcos said in a statement.

Imelda Marcos, 69, had been in seclusion for several days. She and her late husband have been accused of stealing billions of dollars during his presidency. They were ousted in a 1986 "people power" revolt, and Marcos died three years later in exile in Hawaii.

A special anti-graft court had found Imelda Marcos guilty on two corruption charges in 1993.

In January of this year, a Supreme Court panel acquitted her on one charge but upheld her conviction on the second charge, which carried a maximum prison term of 12 years. She was also fined $4.3 million.

The panel, however, allowed Marcos to appeal the ruling one final time to the entire Supreme Court.

Former worker opens fire in a Calif. city hall

RIVERSIDE, Calif. (AP) — A former municipal worker opened fire in a City Hall council chamber yesterday, shooting the mayor and two council members before wounding a policeman as he tried to flee, authorities said.

The gunman was wounded in a gun battle with police and another policeman was hit by gunfire, but his bulletproof vest spared him injury.

The shooting began about 8 a.m. as the City Council was preparing to meet in a City Hall annex, some 60 miles east of Los Angeles.

Councilman Chuck Beaty was hit struck in the face and shoulder during the initial burst of gunfire. He was in critical condition at Riverside Community Hospital, Police Chief Jerry Carroll said. Councilwoman Laura Pearson was hospitalized with a hip wound. Mayor Ron Loveridge was treated and released at a nearby hospital after being grazed by a bullet.

"It was surrealistic, something you would see in a movie or television," the mayor said. "And you also recognize that you may or may not leave the room, ...that this may be your final testimonial, lying in a small room behind the council chambers." He added, "Godspeed to those who were seriously wounded (yesterday)."

Police immediately responded when the gunfire was heard. Police Sgt. Wally Rice was wounded in the lower abdomen and was in surgery, Carroll said.

UM student charged with assaulting female

By Lorraine Kennedy and Eric Petersen
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police, responding to a report of an assault of a woman in the Northeast Residential Area, arrested Ajay Narayanan in Johnson Residence Hall Saturday, Oct. 3.

Narayanan, 19, of 46 Spindlewick Rd., Nashua, N.H., was arraigned early this week in Northampton District Court on charges of assault and battery, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (a concrete wall), and annoying and accosting a person of the opposite sex. He pleaded not guilty to the charges.

Narayanan was released on $10,000 bail and is scheduled to reappear in district court for a post-trial hearing Nov. 5.

At about 10:45 p.m. Saturday, Alesandro Piselli, a resident of Johnson Hall, was just getting ready for bed in his third floor room when he heard a scream from the hallway. When he heard the female voice scream twice more, he decided to investigate.

In the hall, a man wearing black jeans and a gray sweatshirt ran past him. Piselli assumed the man had also been attracted by the screams and was running to get help.

Piselli followed the sound of the screams to a nearby staircase where the victim had been assaulted. Piselli then called the police.

According to University of Massachusetts Chief of Police John Luippold, police allege that the victim encountered Narayanan on a staircase in Johnson Hall. Narayanan blocked the victim's passage through a doorway on a staircase landing and asked her to come to his room. The victim refused and attempted to get past him. Narayanan then grabbed her by the throat and pushed her into a concrete wall.

The victim was able to struggle free and defend herself, Luippold said, referring to the police report. Police allege Narayanan then pushed her towards the stairs, causing her to fall.

The victim, a UMass student who was visiting Johnson Hall, was taken by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton. She was treated for cuts and abrasions as well as an injury to her leg.

Luippold said the investigation of the incident is "open and ongoing."

At the time of the incident, there was no student security receptionist on duty in Johnson Hall. Zoe Johnson, a receptionist who began her shift at Johnson at 8 p.m., said she left at 9:30 p.m. to finish her shift in the Sylvan Residential Area.

According to Assistant Dean of Students Paul Vasconcellos, the University judiciary system is in the process of taking action against Narayanan.

"Even before this incident, we were collecting statements from residents in his hall concerning inappropriate behavior," Vasconcellos said.

Vasconcellos emphasized the serious nature of the incident.

"When things like this happen, we [the University] pursue them and pursue them aggressively. The safety of our students is paramount."

Trustees and students discuss campus issues

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts trustees met with students yesterday in an informal round-table discussion of campus issues.

Among the issues discussed were campus privatization, frustration with bureaucracy, and the CATE (Course And Teacher Evaluation) form.

Elly Court, student trustee said they started these informal sessions two years ago. The trustees met with faculty and union members yesterday as well.

Robert Karam, chairman of the trustee board said the purpose of these meetings is to learn from one another.

"Your job is to think of the big picture," he said "and we'll think of the big picture too."

One issue that is part of the "big picture" at the University is privatization. Court asked about an Ad Hoc Committee for Auxiliary Services that would look into privatization of certain University services.

Resa Singleton, the student coordinator for SCERA (Student Center For Educational Research and Advocacy) explained that an example of privatization would be replacing the Campus Center bookstore with a Barnes and Noble bookstore.

"In small-scale surveys we've done," Singleton said, "students leaned away from privatization."

The trustees said that the committee looking into privatization is still in its preliminary stages, and that they will definitely engage students in the final stages of discussion.

One trustee wondered about the status of the CATE form and Court answered that the task force is working on it, but details are fairly confidential at this point.

"Students were immediately excited about it," said Court. "We received phone calls and letters of support, but the whole issue is complex."

UMass celebrates Coming Out Day

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Correspondent

A rally this Thursday and a variety of lecturers and speakers will mark the tenth anniversary of Coming Out day on Oct. 11 at the University of Massachusetts.

According to Felice Yeskel, director of the Stonewall Resource Center for lesbians, bisexuals, gays and transgenders, campuses and cities all over are celebrating Coming Out day. Felice said that what makes this day different from other minority recognition days is that nobody knows if a person is gay unless that person tells you they are.

"Gay people come from every race, class, and ability," Yeskel said. "Most people know them, but don't know they are gay."

Prejudice grows, she said, "because people think they don't know people who are gay. Those who are gay admit it to themselves first, then they tell others."

Yeskel says she knew she was a lesbian for 10 years before she told those around her.

"I feared a negative response, but across the board, I got a positive one."

Pride Alliance, a registered student organization formerly known as Lesbian, Bisexual, and Gay Alliance, will promote the rally on Thursday at noon by the campus pond. There will also be an open mic for anyone who wishes to speak.

Yeskel said that the Stonewall center provides different cultural and educational programs that are meant to raise awareness and educate heterosexual populations, as well as to support gay people by educating them about their culture.

"For a gay person, it's like attending a predominately white school when your black. You don't see where you came from, what your history has been. There's no identity there. Everywhere you go, it's not you," Yeskel said.

National Coming Out day began ten years ago when there was a march on Washington for gay and lesbian rights.

According to its pamphlet, the Stonewall Center opened in 1985 as a result of research done about heterosexism and homophobia on campus after some anti-gay attacks occurred on campus.

"[Because of the incidents], the gay/bisexual population didn't feel safe," Yeskel said.

Yeskel says she doesn't know the exact number of gay and bisexual people on campus.

It's been said the population is 10 percent, but that's controversial, she said. Some believe it's higher because of Northampton being such a supportive community towards the gay population.

"There's really no way of knowing the numbers," she said.

Yeskel said there are only two other campus programs in the country similar to Stonewall, but they do not offer as much as Stonewall does.

According to Saul Accetta, member of Pride Alliance and a sophomore sociology major, at the rally on Thursday, participants will stake around the pond with triangles that have names of well-known people, such as Walt Whitman, who are (or were in their life) gay. This, he said, helps those who are gay and have not come out, realize they are not alone. He said rallies such as this also helps those who have family members who are gay realize they are not alone as well.

Democrats fight inquiry

GOP push for open-ended investigation

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With a House vote set for tomorrow on launching an open-ended impeachment inquiry, Democrats rushed to counter Republican plans while still underscoring their disapproval of President Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky.

At the White House, spokesman Joe Lockhart accused the GOP leadership of using the impeachment issue "to embarrass the president" and produce political gain for Republicans at the polls this fall.

Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas) said the issue would come to the floor for a vote tomorrow. Republican officials expressed confidence they would prevail, thus making Clinton the third president in history to face possible impeachment proceedings.

"The fact of the matter is, it is about obstruction of justice. It is about lying to the American people," Armey told reporters yesterday. "It is about using all the instruments, and many of the people in the White House... to go out and tell a story that the president himself knew to be untrue."

The GOP-controlled House Judiciary Committee approved a sweeping impeachment inquiry in a party-line vote on Monday, after first brushing aside two Democratic alternatives.

With midterm elections less than a month away, political calculations weighed heavily as the issue moved toward a vote on the House floor.

Rank-and-file Democrats caucused privately during the day to discuss their response to the GOP proposal.

Leaders are likely to redraft a plan that was offered in the Judiciary Committee on Monday that would have limited the scope of the inquiry to the Lewinsky affair, and called for it to be concluded by Nov. 25. A second proposal, authored by Rep. Howard Berman (D-Calif.), would have required the committee to first decide whether Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's allegations, if proven, would constitute impeachable offenses. If so, the Judiciary Committee would then be empowered to investigate with unlimited time.

Party sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the Democratic rank-and-file group remains divided, however. Some liberal lawmakers from safe seats favor no inquiry on grounds that Clinton's offenses don't rise to the level of impeachment. But others, including moderates who face difficult election battles, are likely to vote for the GOP measure, officials said.

"What works in nine districts doesn't work in the 10th," said Rep. Gary Ackerman of New York. He said the Democratic leadership is "trying to figure out where the equilibrium is."

"There are Democrats from rural, conservative districts who will lose if they don't vote" for the GOP proposal, conceded one Democratic official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The White House would like all Democrats to vote against the Republican plan, officials said, to buttress the claim that the GOP is pushing a partisan impeachment probe. But House Democratic leader Dick Gephardt's objective is somewhat different, officials said, and is to ensure the re-election of as many Democrats as possible this fall.

White House officials — concerned with the president's fate — have circulated polling in recent days suggesting that Democrats will fare best nationally in the elections if they oppose the GOP measure. They say Republicans are vulnerable to election-year criticism that they want to open the way to a prolonged investigation at a time when the public favors a swift end to the impeachment drama.

Clinton calls for control of global economy issues

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton urged world economic powers yesterday to take "urgent steps" to limit the turmoil that has roiled global markets. He said the violence of boom-and-bust cycles must be contained.

Addressing financial officials from 182 countries at the International Monetary Fund's annual meetings, Clinton used his strongest language yet to describe the need for all countries to cooperate to calm an economic crisis that has sent U.S. stock prices plummeting and pushed one-third of the world into recession.

"Today the world faces perhaps its most serious financial crisis in half a century," Clinton said. "We must take urgent steps to help those who have been hurt by it, to limit the reach of it and to restore growth and confidence."

Behind the scenes, Clinton administration officials worked feverishly on a number of fronts. The White House confirmed that preliminary discussions were under way on an emergency economic summit in London next month, suggested by British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Meanwhile, Treasury officials worked to put together an emergency rescue package of around $30 billion for Brazil, hoping to keep Latin America's largest economy from being the next to fall victim to panicky investors.

Argentine President Carlos Menem said negotiations on the loans for Brazil could be completed by next week and suggested the emergency lines of credit could be expanded to help other Latin American countries facing difficulty.

The Clinton administration also released a study showing the state-by-state impact that economic problems already have had on American manufacturers and farmers, hoping to increase pressure on Congress to approve $18 billion for the IMF before lawmakers go home.

But Republican opponents in the House insisted the IMF support will not be approved unless the administration accepts restrictions it so far has rejected that would tie the increased money to a major overhaul of the agency. Critics say the IMF badly bungled the Asian crisis by imposing too much austerity and pushing fragile economies into recession.

Clinton, in his remarks, renewed his call for Congress to approve the IMF money, saying, "There is no excuse with refusing to supply the fire department with water while the fire is burning."

He called for finance officials to continue working on proposals endorsed Monday by a special 22-nation conference that are aimed at stabilizing the vast flows of international money.

"We must address not only a run on a bank or firm, but also a run on nations," Clinton said. "We simply must find a way to contain the pattern of boom-bust on an international scale." And he called on Japan to invigorate its economy, something his administration believes is essential for lifting other Asian nations.

In Tokyo, Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi announced plans for a bigger economic stimulus package after officials said the country, already in its worst recession in 50 years, was facing deepening problems.

Cooperation tighter for Britain & China

By Charles Hutzler
Associated Press

BEIJING — China and Britain declared a comprehensive partnership yesterday, opening a new chapter in relations following the smooth handover of Hong Kong 15 months ago.

After talks yesterday between British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji, the two governments pledged to increase cooperation across the board — from environmental protection to closer ties between their militaries.

"Both sides consider that the time is right for the opening of a new chapter in relations between China and the United Kingdom," they said in a statement.

Blair is the first British prime minister to visit China in seven years. His five-day trip caps efforts to repair the damage to relations over Hong Kong, especially from British moves to increase democracy before returning the colony to China on July 1, 1997. Blair and Zhu discussed human rights, the global financial crisis and the conflict in Kosovo, among other topics today, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Tang Guoqiang said.

Zhu welcomed Blair by emphasizing the rapport they established during the Chinese premier's visit to London in April. "Although we have only met a few times, it seems we have known each other for many years," Zhu said.

Zhu told Blair he should "make himself at home" and feel free to raise any issues he liked.

Blair raised human rights and Chinese-ruled Tibet with Zhu. Before leaving Britain, Blair had pledged to discuss those concerns, but said he would do so quietly in keeping with the softer approach most European Union governments and the United States have adopted.

Tang, the Chinese spokesman, said human rights and Tibet were only mentioned briefly. He added that he detected "no serious or major differences" between the prime ministers.

Trying to brighten the atmosphere for Blair's visit, China signed the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights at the United Nations on Monday, more than six months after promising to do so.

Zhu also announced that President Jiang Zemin has agreed to visit Britain next summer, the first Chinese head of state to do so in the 49-year history of the People's Republic.

The partnership deal promised increased political consultations, including discussion of human rights, and outlined cooperation in areas from employment training to crime fighting.

China has made similar arrangements with many countries, including France, Russia and the United States.

With a group of business leaders in tow, Blair arrived in Beijing this morning. Greeted by Premier Zhu Rongji, the pair reviewed an honor guard on Tiananmen Square before retreating for discussions inside the Great Hall of the People.

Blair praised Hong Kong's smooth transition to Chinese rule, saying "we are very happy about the present situation in Hong Kong."

Blair will visit Hong Kong, the last stop on his five-day visit.

GOP report reveals $1.7 million in illegal or suspect donations

By John Solomon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Democratic Party has not returned $1.7 million in donations that Republican investigators on the House committee probing fund-raising abuses say are either illegal or clearly suspect, according to an internal report.

The report, written by the House Government Reform and Oversight Committee, details numerous donations connected to controversial fund-raising figures as James Riady and John Huang. The money went to the Democratic National Committee, Democratic state parties or other Democratic fund-raising committees. The report says it believes the money should be returned.

The donations the report cited are from 1992 through 1996.

"Time and time again the DNC received information regarding the illegality or inappropriateness of contributions but failed to take the appropriate action of returning or disgorging them," said the report.

Moreover, the report said, often when the DNC confronted with suspect contributions it could not get more information about, it kept the funds.

The DNC did not immediately respond to a request for comment. Of the $1.7 million cited, more than $1 million was collected by the DNC, the GOP report said. The Republican staffers added that they are investigating "hundreds of thousands of dollars in additional questionable contributions, many of which are almost certainly illegal."

Among the donations the committee cited was $50,000 in contributions written by a college student in Philadelphia named Kuang Tao Zhou. The committee said its evidence shows that a day before the student made a $50,000 donation to the DNC, he received a check for $50,000 from a person in Los Angeles. That money, the report said, was traced to a wire transfer from China.

The committee said Zhou also made more than $20,000 in donations to various Democratic entities around the time he received a $19,985 wire transfer from an account in Taiwan.

Democratic Party accountants and investigators tried to verify the address and telephone for Zhou, but failed to get any response, the report said.

"As in other instances of suspect contributions, despite the paucity of information... the DNC decided to retain Zhou's $50,000 contribution," said the report.

House examines administration strike

By Kevin Galvin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration's efforts to help the Teamsters end a bitter strike in 1995 came under renewed congressional scrutiny yesterday when former U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor appeared before a House panel.

A House Education and the Workforce subcommittee has been probing the extent of administration activity around the strike at Diamond Walnut Growers Inc. and whether the officials involved were motivated by the pursuit of union campaign contributions.

The administration's actions in the strike at the Stockton, Calif.-based agriculture cooperative is a critical issue in a Justice Department inquiry. The department is weighing whether to request an independent counsel to probe testimony by Harold Ickes, a former White House deputy chief of staff, to a Senate panel that examined Diamond Walnut earlier.

Kantor told the committee that a phone call he placed to a company official at Ickes' behest wasn't motivated by fund raising and that the administration never acted to punish the company on behalf of the Teamsters.

"No one ever tried to persuade me to do anything negative to Diamond Walnut and we didn't," Kantor said.

The Teamsters had worked since 1993 to pressure the company to settle with more than 300 mostly minority and female workers who had granted contract concessions in the 1980s to help the company compete but were denied wage increases in negotiations in 1991, when profits were up.

In 1995, Ickes met with Teamsters leaders about the standoff. An administration memo prepared for Ickes, which has been widely reported on since last year, reminded him that the Teamsters had given $2.4 million for Democrats in 1992. It also suggested that if Democrats wanted to continue to receive Teamsters support, they should consider helping the union on key issues, such as the strike.

People who participated in the meetings have told The Associated Press that campaign contributions were never discussed. And former Teamsters President Ron Carey was outspoken in his criticism of President Clinton's policies toward labor.

Ickes told Senate negotiators under oath that he wasn't aware that the administration had taken any action to help settle the strike. At the same time, Ickes has confirmed that Kantor called the company at his request to discuss the standoff.

Kantor was expected to spell out what he discussed with William Cuff, formerly the company's chief officer. Cuff also was called to testify.

Other memos show that the Labor Department targeted Diamond Walnut under the short-lived striker-replacement law and that the Teamsters urged Agriculture Department officials to cut the company from its school lunch program and end subsidies it received to help market products abroad.

But top union leaders continued to complain that the administration did little to help.

Indeed, the workers were replaced and the strike has never been settled.

As late as March 1997, Bill Hamilton, the Teamsters then-director of government affairs, complained bitterly to a Labor Department official that nothing was being done.

"The trustees are going to back you up. We should get it done," Karam said.

Jesse Burchfield, SGA attorney general, focused the trustees attention on a difficulty many students on campus share — dealing with administrative "red tape."

Terrence Dolan, a student trustee from the University of Massachusetts-Dartmouth campus talked about a pilot program on his campus that has helped ease students getting tangled up in red tape. To serve students more efficiently, he said, officials there have made it possible to access all administrative departments at one desk.

Trustees said this campus will install computer software called Peoplesoft in approximately five years time, which would connect all services in Whitmore.

"Students are not viewed as customers, and that really bothers me," said Board of trustee member Christy Mihos.

Wildfires continue to burn in CA

By Jeff Wong
Associated Press

BANNING, Calif. — Two giant wildfires pushed by Santa Ana winds burned out of control yesterday after forcing more than 1,000 people from their homes.

Riverside County hills covered with tinder-dry brush quickly ignited Monday. A pilot was killed in the crash of an air tanker and a fire captain died of a heart attack while protecting a home. The largest blaze, dubbed the Mount Edna fire, was estimated at 23,893 acres. The other fire a few miles to the north has charred 4,200 acres.

The National Weather Service said the northeast winds were dying down in the so-called badlands region 90 miles east of Los Angeles but would continue at 10 mph to 20 mph, with stronger gusts. Temperatures were above normal and humidity would remain low. "That makes for real good burning," said fire spokesman Iral Evans.

Officials unified command of 2,500 firefighters, 11 air tankers and other equipment.

At least three structures were destroyed — a house, a mobile home and an unidentified building.

Capt. Thomas Oscar Wall, 44, of the Orange County Fire Authority died of a heart attack while hosing down roofs in Calimesa. He collapsed after telling colleagues he wasn't feeling well and was having trouble breathing.

"He was lying on the lawn and we brought him a pillow out," said resident Missy Starrette. "He said he just didn't feel good and so he laid down and then he went into cardiac arrest."

An air tanker was fighting the larger blaze when it crashed. The pilot was presumed dead, but conditions made it impossible to get to the area. The pilot's identity was withheld.

The aircraft was a single-seat Grumman S-2, a Korean War-vintage, twin-engine bomber that carries 800 gallons of fire retardant.

Meanwhile, with the winds calm overnight, about 1,000 residents who were evacuated were allowed to return to their homes, at least for the time being. The Santa Ana winds were expected to pick up again during the day.

Among those evacuated Monday were Dorothy Misner, 88, and her husband, William Misner, 87. A deputy came to their door shouting through a bullhorn to leave the area. They were whisked to Yucaipa Valley High School.

Midwesterners are happy

By Jane E. Allen
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The sunny mythology of the Golden State still shines, but researchers say those in chillier climes enjoy an equal measure of happiness and contentment.

Two thousand college students from the Midwest and Southern California were asked to predict which region had the happier student populace. Both groups overwhelmingly chose California as the place most likely to satisfy.

But when asked to rate their own quality of life, students living in the chill of Ann Arbor, Mich., and Columbus, Ohio, turned out to be just as happy as those in the sunshine of Los Angeles and Irvine, Calif.

Why the gap between perception and reality?

"Unfortunately, the most obvious differences between locations such as climate are not always the most important determinants of happiness," said David Schkade, a management professor at the University of Texas and co-author of Does Living in California Make People Happy?

When people think of Los Angeles, they tend to focus on its most alluring distinctions: the warm and sunny climate and the museums, shopping and beaches.

In reality, "most people don't ever go to Rodeo Drive much less shop there, and most people don't go to the beach at Malibu," Schkade said.

Instead, he said, "how happy you are depends a lot less on the distinctive features of the place than it does on the ordinary activities of the day."

Indeed, when the students were asked to rate the factors most important to their well-being, they picked job prospects, academic opportunity, finances and social life.

Detroit native Jim Peterson, a 30-year-old financial planner for Nissan Motor Corp. in Gardena, Calif., said he left his home state for a good job but misses his family.

"I might be marginally happier here in California, but it wouldn't kill me if I had to leave," said the 1990 Michigan graduate. "My happiness is focused on my friends network and my job."

Schkade and Daniel Kahneman of Princeton University presented their study in the September issue of Psychological Science, published by the American Psychological Society.

They surveyed students from the University of Michigan, Ohio State University, the University of California at Los Angeles, and the University of California at Irvine.

The researchers call the perception phenomenon "focusing illusion."

"When people focus on a possible change in their lives, such as moving to a new place, they are likely to exaggerate the effect of this change on their well-being, for better or for worse," Schkade said, adding that this is the same illusion exploited by the arbiters and marketers of consumer taste.

"We want to believe that if we change our clothes or our weight or get a new car, it's really going to make us better off," he said.

Suburban legends

Has anyone ever told you that Southwest residential area is the second most densely populated square quarter mile in the nation? How about that it's the third most densely populated square quarter mile in the world?

If so, then you have duped by one of UMass' most common myths. I distinctly recall hearing this magnificent fact and being pretty proud that my campus had such an impressive plot of land on it. Then I learned the harsh truth.

"Wouldn't you see a glowing figure walking down the hill if you were tripping your brains out?It was probably a squirrel. Let's move on."

The only thing special about the size and structure of Southwest is that it's the most densely populated residential area on campus. That's about a unique a distinction as being the tallest person on your bicycle. (Think about it, it was really quite a clever analogy.)

Seth Koenig

Myths, as we all know, are stories that have been orally transferred from one generation to another as time goes on. These are also sometimes referred to as legends, or "old wives' tales." UMass, like any other place, has its very own myths, that, like any other place's, are often not based on truths.

Our myths often sound like statistics, like the aforementioned example of Southwest, so they can be very convincing. Sometimes, however, they are just hearsay, like rumors, and are no more complex or detailed than simple ghost stories.

One is that there was once an apple orchard on the hill before a residential area was built there. (Gee, guess which residential area.) These two students were drunk one night (no, that's not the myth) and went up to the orchard to climb and eat apples and do drunk things like vomit and scream pointlessly. One of the guys fell out of the tree and broke his neck, tearing the bejesus out of the other. The remaining drunk bolted down the hill, probably tripping over his own two feet the entire way.

Well, the next morning, the guy went up to find his dead friend, but the body was gone (insert spooky music here). Nobody ever saw that guy again — in the flesh. Ever since, people say they see this drunk college kid wandering down the hill towards lower Central. That's a true legend — ask around.

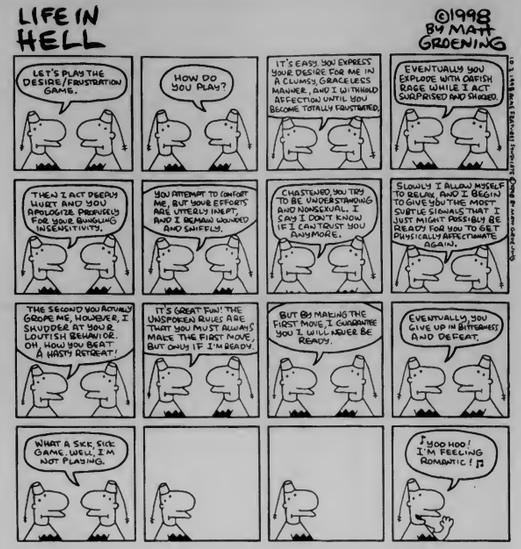
Now, this is probably, again, just a story. The story originates in Central, which means there's got to be acid involved. Wouldn't you see a glowing figure walking down the hill if you were tripping your brains out? It was probably a squirrel. Let's move on.

As far as ghosts are concerned, there's supposedly another one roaming the staircases of Mary Lyon Hall in Northeast. A couple of decades ago, some dame hung herself from the stairs, and apparently regretted it beyond death, because the myth says that she never left (more spooky music, please.)

I know some folks from Northeast, and they're swell people so I'm going to refrain from the "Well, if you lived in Northeast, wouldn't you hang yourself, too?" joke, that's just waiting to be said — and can be applied to really any place on campus if you think about it with the right (or wrong) frame of mind.

This story has got to be a myth for the simple fact that, quite plainly, if you've killed yourself to get away, why stay there after you've died? Doesn't that kind of defeat the purpose? Come on, now. My ghost is going to the Caribbean, no questions asked!

Escaping the X-Files portion of this column we'll deal with the myth about the W.E.B. Dubois Library. Yes, bricks are actually falling off the sides, not with the frequency that some would have you believe (by the way some folks tell it, the library is like a big brick sprinkler and passing by it means certain death — another ghost story perhaps?), but they are falling.



The legend I'm talking about is the one about the library slowly sinking into the ground. I'm just chomping at the bit to wait until the place is almost under and jump on top of it to reenact scenes from Titanic. (Never give up, Rose! Promise me!")

Seriously, though, the library, which is, in fact, the second tallest red brick library in the country (see the bicycle analogy in paragraph 3), isn't going anywhere. You don't have to run in and out as fast as you can when you need books for fear of being trapped in the dramatic sinking, because it's not happening.

Another big myth that has been passed on for generations, is that people in Whitmore are working. Again, it's just a nasty rumor that some fraternity guys started twenty or thirty years ago to scare incoming freshmen. The people in the Administration Building are like government employees — they are getting paid, but they're not actually accomplishing anything.

When confronted with a question about University policy or maintenance, they swiftly direct your inquiry to another person, or another desk, or another room, or another building, or another small island country. Don't worry, they're just occupying space. That's a particularly cruel legend that never should've been started.

Service with a smile

As Mary Jane McKenna, executive director of the Massachusetts Office of Travel and Tourism, said when she spoke on campus recently, tourism is one of the three largest industries in Massachusetts. When I started work at a luxury hotel in Boston this summer, I became a part of it. In a famous, historically significant hotel like the one I found in Boston, emotionally-aware employees are absolutely a requirement to satisfy the customers. In such a job, what sort of direction and training in "people skills" could I expect from my employer? How would I be trained for skills many people don't recognize exist?

I was about to find out. Everybody knows how a hotel works, right? Check–in, check–out; maybe some room service. That's just the beginning. I could only have imagined the intricacies of handling people, of catering to their "wants, needs, and desires," as many Hotel, Restaurant, and Travel Administration (HRTA) professors have defined "hospitality." But most enlightening was the way I was handled in preparation for this task. I can only describe the orientation process as akin to cult indoctrination, but without the negative connotations.

Tanya Mannes

With eight other new recruits, I suffocated in an oak–paneled suite, or "sensory deprivation chamber," learning about the company, the hotel, and our "mission." Our company–set goal was to transform the hotel from a three– diamond to a four–diamond property. The human resources director and her assistant emphasized that we had the "Power of One," the ability to "go beyond our job" to help out a guest. They served us a buffet with little bottled drinks at noon, to keep our strength up.

"I can only describe the orientation process as akin to cult indoctrination, but without the negative connotations."

Some of the new employees would work in housekeeping, and many of them spoke little to no English. Nevertheless, we all played an ice–breaking game: interviewing each other about our hobbies and such. One of the women who spoke Spanish said that for her hobby, she liked to clean the house. It seemed as though most of them were eager to make a good impression, and I was no different — if a bit more subtle.

The training that day continued, with strategies to "make each guest's first minute and last minute count" at the hotel. The human resources director unveiled, very seriously, a list of phrases never to use with a guest. Some of them were "That's not my job," "I don't know," "Go over there and ask so–and–so about that," and my favorite, "No." Never use the word "no." Don't even say "No problem," because it sounds negative. Irony was dead.

Then we were given a list of words we could use. These words included "Absolutely," "Definitely," "My pleasure." We should say "please," and "thank you." We moved on to "Four Diamond body language." My head felt a little overwhelmed with all this positive vocabulary. Kid stuff.

Throughout the day, I sat with a receptive smile on my face, listening and nodding, absorbing the "company culture" I had heard about in human resources classes. At one point the human resources assistant began referring to us as "one big family" here at the hotel. As the "love–bombing" continued, I visualized the surly coffee–house culture in the Pioneer Valley, full of grumpy kids like you and me, making minimum wage. I wavered between being impressed with the gorgeous, well–managed hotel and the professional team, to thinking, "What are they so gung–ho about?"

I realized that no training program or orientation like this could teach me to make a guest happy. For a career or job in the service industry a person has to learn those elusive people skills on her own. Western society is only beginning to realize the science of great personality, with the Emotional Quotient test (EQ) fast becoming as well– respected as the IQ test as an indicator of success in life. Sure, in management classes a person might get some tips on listening skills, body language and time management. Orientation may teach new employees some words to use, but those are cheat sheets for the intangible quality known as hospitality — for the ability to like and respect people, to be sincere, to communicate.

The climactic end of the orientation came at last. At a cue from the human resources director, thirteen people paraded into the stuffy suite with big grins. Some had chefs' whites; some wore maids' uniforms. Quite a few wore suits. I recognized one as my future manager. They stood in a row, and looked at us silently for a moment, then all thirteen broke into "Consider Yourself One of Us." You could feel the love, or maybe it was just the lack of oxygen. At this point I sat, blinking at them in amazement. It was official. my first foray into a really professional environment. The next day I would get behind the front desk, reborn, ready to flex my emotional muscle.

Letters to the Editor

Student body must vote

To the editor:

There are two truths to life as a student. One: It is easy to believe that as a student we can and will have our rights trampled over. Two: It is too easy to remain a student forever.

These two truths have never been more apparent than the suggestion by certain elected town officials to remove the voting booth from the Southwest area. The voting machine located there is not a bone being fed to the campus to encourage us to play along in the game of government. That little metal box is the deed to the country.

At the age of 18 in this country we are granted certain sacred privileges. A whole new counter at the Dairy Mart is up for sale, we can get shot while waging war for our country, and we can vote. Many of us could deal with Dairy Mart closing down its mysterious back counter. Most of us could deal with not being shot at. We can not, however, part with our right to vote.

Each waking morning we have to wonder why we are still paying outrageous amounts of money for school. Never have we paid more. Likewise, never has the administration cracked down harder on our rights.

This happens everyday because we allow it to. There is this lazy suspicion that we do not have an equal say in what goes on in this country. It's a lazy suspicion because it is temporarily true. In recent elections, those between the ages of 18 and 24 have not been an active political mass. In fact, those 65 years and older often out–vote their grandchildren three to one. The silent majority is made up of the active gray.

The deadline to register to vote is Oct. 14th. There will be tables in the Campus Center, the Student Union and the dining halls. Students will also be going door to door with registration forms. If you never register to vote, you never even give yourself a chance to defend your rights. Don't miss this opportunity to get in the door for democracy.

Roots of Evil looks at reasons for atrocities by nations in wartime

By Gregory R. Ng
Collegian Correspondent

Imagine your parents, relatives, friends and neighbors slaughtered right before your eyes. Children in Rwanda and Angola, among other developing nations, didn't have to imagine this genocide. They were the victims of genocide. Devastation swept through Rwanda as a substantial number of families became insecure, and children were left to lead their families in times of despair. In Angola, due to an on–going civil war, communities were destroyed as young adolescents, forced to become soldiers, were trained to fight at an early age.

University of Massachusetts psychology professor Ervin Staub explores these conditions and their underlying causes in his book The Roots of Evil. The book recounts the plights of torture, genocide, prejudice, and humanitarianism among many nations at war. Professor Staub accounts for the influences behind one group's desire to harm another by using violence to create a "better world" with a "moral equilibrium."

The book is the inspiration for a three–part television documentary which was aired on The Discovery Channel on Sept. 5, 1998. "The series explores the struggle between good and evil around the world and the roles of ordinary people, governments, and powerful leaders in promoting or resisting inhuman acts," said Staub.

The series was produced by Rex Bloomstein, a British producer, for the British Broadcasting Corporation and The Discovery Channel. Issues raised in the initial hour–long program examine the idea that most evil acts are committed by ordinary people, including the reactions which have caused neighbors to kill neighbors in Rwanda and Bosnia.

"The series looks, in a vivid manner, at what leads individual human beings as well as groups, to do great harm to others. It looks at conditions that lead to evil and the ovature of evil–doers. The series also looks at those who passively stand by and those who speak out," said Staub.

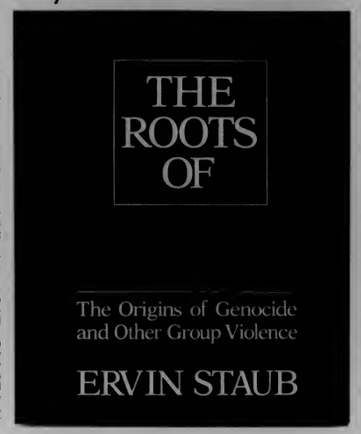
The second segment showcases torture and how it is used by governments around the world today, and what effect this has on the individuals and societies that condone torture.

The final segment focuses on the ancient evil of tyranny. In many cases, especially in the case of Hitler and the Holocaust, there was an overly strong respect for authority among the citizens.

"This creates a monolithic society with limited values and a limited set of rules without any free exchange of public beliefs," said Staub. "This proves that followers are also important, because leaders can't accomplish anything (without them)." When the followers are expressively supportive, they also become passive bystanders.

Countries also become bystanders, as humanitarian aid may not be in their national interest. Genocide and violence are basically ignored, contributing to a counter–productive process.

"The West, on a whole, hasn't done a great deal to help resolve and do its share to help to create conditions for peace after genocide," he said.



A prime example is the genocide in Rwanda, April 1994, of the Tutsi tribe and the Hutu tribe. These tribes have been fighting since 1994 for the control of the government and have been living together in the central African countries of Rwanda and Burundi since 1959. The Tutsi dominated government seemed to want a peaceful cooperative society which would work together after defeating the government's army. Many Hutus, however, fled and became refugees in other countries. In 1994, they returned and were the perpetrators of genocide by again killing Tutsies. Meanwhile, most western countries did not react and permitted the circle of genocide to continue.

It was a different story in Bosnia, however, where "after hesitation, the United States and some of the rest of the world, contributed a genuine effort without a guarantee of success to restore conditions for peace and feel compassionate for humanity beyond their own borders," said Staub.

"If it doesn't effect the national interest (in terms of) wealth, power, and influence, then (the nation) doesn't want to make any effort or sacrifice."

Staub, a member of the psychology faculty at the University since 1971, has focused his research and writing on a number of issues. These include the causes and prevention of genocide, mass killing and ethnic conflict in general, and the behavior of bystanders during emergencies and violent episodes.

Staub has also studied youth violence, how to raise caring and helpful children, helping behavior, and altruism. He is currently working on a book about raising caring and non– violent children.

Psychology professor, Ervin Staub, explores the psychological roots of evil acts of violence.

Award for book on Peru history goes to Stern

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Correspondent

The decade–and–a–half terror campaign that left more than 27,000 dead during Peru's Maoist Shining Path Guerrilla movement forms the subject of University of Massachusetts librarian Peter A. Stern's 1998 Jose Torbio Medina Award–winning bibliography.

Sendero Luminoso: An Annotated Bibliography of the Shining Path Guerrilla Movement, 1983–1990, was written in 1995 by Stern and contains citations from 1,185 books and periodicals in both Spanish and English about the Maoist movement and its founder Abimael Guzman.

The entries, presented chronologically, outline how Guzman organized Sendero Luminoso into a credible fighting force, one that posed a serious threat to Peru's government and ruling elite.

The book reveals — after Guzman's capture in 1992 and the announcement that he would negotiate with the Peruvian government — that his once powerful and devoted group of followers turned against him.

The loss of the Guzman's leadership, a philosophy professor from a provincial university in Peru's rural highlands, caused the movement to fade into obscurity, said Stern.

Stern says the movement — Sendero Luminoso — was and continues to be widely misunderstood. The movement was initially misinterpreted as a revival of the ancient Incas, said Stern.

Sendero recruited among the Indian and peasants and learned the native language, but its leaders were always dedicated, college–based revolutionaries.

Guzman and his followers took advantage of the Peruvian governments longtime indifference to the poverty and misery suffered by the Indians in the rural Andean highlands and carefully built a base of support before launching their war, said Stern.

Sendero Luminoso differed from other Latin American revolutionaries, they were home grown and did not accept backing from other communist states such as Cuba or China.

Sendero Luminoso did however, become allied with narcotics traffickers in Peru. This allowed them to gather large sums of money for their revolutionary activities.

The Medina Award is given annually by the Seminar on the Acquisition of Latin American Library Materials (SALALM) for outstanding contributions to Latin American Studies in areas of bibliography and reference.

Stern is the University Spanish, Portuguese, and Latin American Studies librarian.

Scott goes abroad to represent UM in education issue

By Rebecca Sabla
Collegian Correspondent

University Chancellor David K. Scott, as a representative of the University of Massachusetts, will attend two international conferences dealing with higher education at a global level.

From Oct. 5 to Oct. 9, Scott will be part of the United States delegation to the "Higher Education in the 21st Century: Vision and Action" conference in Paris, France. The conference, sponsored by the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), will allow leaders in higher education from across the United States to collaborate with fellow leaders from around the globe on the issue of higher education and the pressing demand for it.

As a contributing member to the conference's agenda, Scott suggested the creation of a program similar to the Peace Corp that would send retired faculty to "help with higher education–al systems where there is a desperate need for additional staff and support," said Scott. In addition, he questioned, "Why couldn't UMass Amherst be a center for such an effort?"

Scott said that the conference's agenda will also devise a plan to take advantage of the "tremendous possibilities for education worldwide."

"How can one make the [education–al] revolution one that doesn't leave so many people behind?" he said.

Currently, less than 1 percent of the world population has had some form of higher education, said Scott.

Scott believes higher education needs to be made more accessible before the percentage decreases even more.

"So we need to discuss what we can do to create new models, new ways of providing higher education. That is what the UNESCO conference is about."

Following the Paris conference, Scott will attend the "1998 Mission to Israel for Presidents of Prominent American Universities" from Oct. 31 to Nov. 10. Sponsored by the American–Israel Friendship League and Israel Office of Academic Affairs in the USA, 1998 Mission to Israel is one of the first conferences to focus on interaction between higher education presidents and Israeli government officials.

"Israel is a highly educate and highly literate society," said Scott. Learning is "deeply ingrained in the culture of the country." By developing "greater linkages and exchanges with Israel," UMass and the world would benefit.

Scott will also meet with scholars and professionals in an attempt to establish academic relations. Scott notes that "higher education is in transition in the U.S. and around the world." Cooperation among participants in the conference will ease the transition and "show us that the issues we are struggling with — such as interdisciplinary learning — other institutions are facing as well."

Additionally, the members of the conference will be looking at economic development and how universities are linked to business and economy, Scott explained.

According to Scott, "The linkages we establish on these missions are important to our students. My aim is to have every student at the University get experience with another language or culture. Our students need to be able to understand different people and cultures to function well in today's global world."

At the University, Scott would like to see the number of undergraduate students who participate in the study abroad and international programs rise from the current 10 percent to 25 percent by the year 2001.

"Just reading and studying our own world without engagement beyond our borders is not adequate anymore," he said.

In addition to studying abroad, Scott advocates the recognition of international volunteer activities on students' transcripts. The more students who have some type of "global component in their education," Scott said, the "greater the chance of... world peace."

Not only will international programs strengthen the student's appreciation of culture and the world, but it will also uphold UMass's reputation as "very well known and regarded throughout the world," said Scott. Although UMass has already established an international sister school, the University of Hokkaido, in Japan, it is still important "to work hard to keep UMass as a player on the world stage."

Letter of Hope: Future of China's Human Rights Policy Re–Evaluated

Oct. 5, 1998 — Human Rights in China (HRIC) welcomes China's signing of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) today. This gesture implies a commitment on the part of the government to refrain from actions which violate the rights contained in the ICCPR. We hope that this will be followed quickly concrete steps to ratify and implement the Covenant.

For years, human rights and democracy activists inside China risked their freedom to campaign for their government to respect international human rights standards and recognize their authority. In the face of official hostility, they have documented human rights abuses and brought these to the attention of the international community. Only last week, five leading rights advocates issued two documents, the Declaration on Civil Rights and Freedoms and the Declaration on Civil Rights and Social Justice.

"It is precisely our individual civil freedoms that we Chinese people are most lacking today, and that we most urgently need to establish protections for," the first Declaration states, urging Chinese citizens to take action to bring about change.

As the first Declaration points out, the Chinese authorities continue to impose systematic restrictions on the exercise of the rights and freedoms contained in the ICCPR, despite rhetoric about thier commitment to human rights.

As a demonstration of its new commitment, the government should recognize the legitimate demands of Chinese citizens, such as the authors of the Declarations, and open public dialogue with all sectors of Chinese society. So far, the Chinese government has only agreed to engage in such dialogues with representatives of foreign governments and international agencies, while rebuffing all attempts at opening the more crucial domestic debate.

Finally, the HRIC calls on the Chinese government to release all those dctained for the peaceful exercise of the basic rights enshrined in the ICCPR... Those who should be released include some 2,000 individuals found guilty of alleged "counterrevolutionary crimes," participants in the 1989 pro–democracy movement, as well as thousands of other political, religious, and ethnic prisoners.

— Excerpted from a letter by Xiao Qiang, executive director of the HRIC.

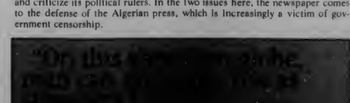
Global Censorship



Cartoons and introduction republished courtesy of Reporters sans Frontières

A team of journalists and cartoonists in Constantine, Algeria started a satirical newspaper called Mesmar ("The Nail," a reference to a well–known Algerian story) on April 22, 1996. Just after the third issue appeared on May 13, publishing manager Mohamed Zetib and editor Moustapha Nattour were arrested at their homes by the Constantine police. The next day cartoonist Mohamed Nacer Belfounes was arrested, followed a few hours later by another cartoonist, Mohamed Sraifi.

All four were released on May 15 after being charged with "insulting a public institution" and "defaming symbols of the state." They were placed under legal supervision and their passports were taken away. On May 21 the examining magistrate in charge of the case suspended Mesmar until the case was dealt with.

Mesmar is full of cartoons and short articles that parody Algerian society and criticize its political rulers. In the two issues here, the newspaper comes to the defense of the Algerian press, which is increasingly a victim of government censorship.

Film festival Strikes it rich

By Hillel Italie
Associated Press

NEW YORK — They have been two of Manhattan's more dependable annual rites: the New York Film Festival and Woody Allen movies. But until recently no one got around to bringing them together.

Such quintessential Allen (and Manhattan) movies as Annie Hall, Manhattan and Hannah and Her Sisters didn't make it to the prestigious festival, now in its 36th year. Only in 1994, with Bullets Over Broadway, was an Allen film included. And only this year, with Celebrity, did programmers give Allen opening night honors.

"Some of his films just weren't coming out at the right time of the year to be available. And, for some unknown reason, they were never offered to us," said Wendy Keys, a longtime member of the festival's selection committee. "We just never sat down and watched a Woody Allen film to consider it for a film festival."

Allen, an anti-celebrity who did not attend any festival parties or press conferences, is not known to go out of his way to promote his movies. But both Bullets Over Broadway and Celebrity were distributed by Miramax Films, which has been known to go out of its way to promote movies. Over the summer, Miramax approached the festival's selection committee and offered an early screening of Celebrity.

"We thought it was one of his more provocative films," said festival programmer Richard Pena. "Celebrity seemed like a perfect fit for opening night."

Allen does have a history with the festival's organizers, the Film Society of Lincoln Center. In the late 1970s, he helped arrange the center's tribute to Bob Hope and he has always taken an interest in the movies shown at the New York festival.

Celebrity stars Kenneth Branagh as a Woody Allen stand-in — a neurotic magazine writer who encounters major and minor players of the show business world. Also featured are Judy Davis as his neurotic ex-wife, Leonardo DiCaprio as a mercurial matinee idol and Melanie Griffith and Winona Ryder as self-absorbed actresses.

While Celebrity quickly sold out its two public screenings at the festival, Allen missed out on another dependable Manhattan institution: raves for his work from The New York Times, which in the past has usually given Allen's work a boost. Critic Janet Maslin wrote that she found parts of the film "astonishingly flat" and that most of what Celebrity has to say about fame "is what you already know."

Celebrity was one of 26 films included at the two-week festival, which was to end Sunday. Other directors featured were Ken Loach (My Name is Joe) John Boorman (The General), Hal Hartley (Book of Life), Eric Rohmer (A Tale of Autumn) and the Taviani brothers (You're Laughing).

Ingmar Bergman was represented by the elegiac In the Presence of a Clown, and Todd Solondz's controversial Happiness, the talk of the Toronto International Film Festival, got a chance to shock another round of moviegoers. Another anticipated work was Black Cat, White Cat, by Emir Kusturica, best known to American audiences for the Johnny Depp film Arizona Dream.

As always, the festival offered a handful of retrospectives. They included Boorman's 1967 thriller, Point Blank, a restored and expanded version of G.W. Pabst's The Joyless Street, a risque 1925 drama from Germany that gave Greta Garbo her first major role, and Strike, an early film by the Soviet director Sergei Eisenstein, maker of Potemkin with its famous shot of a baby carriage bouncing down the Odessa steps.

Some festival highlights:

—Velvet Goldmine

Is this the Citizen Kane of rock movies? Todd Haynes' decadent musical about the British "glam rock" scene of the 1970s is the story of a departed superstar and the journalist who interviews those who knew him — or think they knew him. "Rosebud" here is a shiny pin that allegedly once belonged to Oscar Wilde, immortalized by Haynes as the original glam rocker. A few dull spots, but there's enough style and atmosphere to make you wish

Haynes had directed one of this year's two movies about the death of disco. And the music will keep you going through the dull spots.

—In the Presence of a Clown

Ingmar Bergman's latest is a metaphysical farce, a concept that would be a farce for most directors. The time is the 1920s and 54-year-old Carl Akerblom has a dream: to make a live, talking movie about the last days of Franz Schubert. Carl's first problem isn't money, but logistics: He must get himself released from a psychiatric ward.

Bergman turned 80 last summer and it is hoped that the film's themes of death and last works aren't too personal. The script is full of life and humor and intelligence, as if Bergman were energized by his own mortality. And the filmmaker keeps finding fresh ways to look at some very old topics: illusion, identity, bodily functions, depression, the presence of clowns, the silence of God.

—An Autumn Tale

French director Eric Rohmer, one of the world's most graceful writers of dialogue, is a bourgeois mystic. He transforms seemingly weightless stories about the affluent and the educated into meditations on faith and death and morality.

Autumn Tale, the last of Rohmer's cycle of films about the seasons, has a typically light surface. Two friends simultaneously seek mates for an attractive middle-aged widow. What follows is flirtation, conflict, philosophizing and, at last, connection.

Rohmer's stories don't sound like much on paper, but take away Jane Austen's language and her plots don't sound much better.

—The Celebration

The title is as ironic as Todd Solondz's Happiness. An affluent Danish family gathers to "celebrate" the patriarch's 60th birthday, only to skewer him like a roast pig. Directed by Michael Vinterberg, this entertaining picture was made under the rules of "Dogma 95," a Reformation-like document in which a handful of Danish filmmakers promised to restrict themselves to handheld cameras, natural sound and light and location shooting.

The characters behave a bit too naturally. Be prepared for the rudest dinner toasts ever put on screen.

—Rushmore

The rare movie that deserves a sequel, a lot of sequels. Martin Fischer, the most interesting comic creation in a long time, is a horn-rimmed, officious teen-ager for whom the world is but a club waiting to name him president. For now, he must settle for having the run of Rushmore Academy, a leafy private school where Martin (Jason Schwartzman) finds himself competing with a lonely millionaire (Bill Murray)

DJ Spooky weaves style, texture

COURTESY PHYLLIS CALEMBO

DJ Spooky has moved his way up from the bottom of the barrel to the top of the charts with his newest album Riddim Warfare.

RIDDIM WARFARE
DJ Spooky (That Subliminal Kid)
Outpost

Who says the U.S. electronic/DJ scene is second-rate? Not DJ Spooky That Subliminal Kid, whose new album, Riddim Warfare, is hip, totally post-modern, and a must-have for pop culture connoisseurs. This album makes you proud to be American. It's for people who are sick of the same pounding beat all night. It's not a dance album by a long shot, but what it lacks in formulaic pop, it makes up many times over in stylish, well-meshed textures.

Check out the guests that weave in and out of DJ Spooky's sometimes eerie, sometimes energy-charged hip hop: Sonic Youth's Thurston Moore, Kool Keith and the members of Organized Konfusion, to name a few. Killah Priest from Wu-Tang shines in "Degree Zero," which echos Wu-Tang's Asian-futuristic-mystical-Biblical themes. The mix of sound and smart wordplay represents a diverse culture, fragmentations that nevertheless are really blended. As in some of Wu-Tang's albums, the sci-fi spoken word parts get tedious at times, but the jazzy follow-ups weave it together. "Synchronic Disjects," an absolutely gnawing urban symphony, deserves a mention as well.

No wonder there are no liner notes included with Riddim Warfare. As part of the Lower East Side's "illbient scene" since the early '90s, DJ Spooky has seen his notorious stripped, texturized hip-hop go from every critic's favorite target, to the hottest thing in pop culture. Rolling Stone ranked his album Dreamer, one of the three worst albums of 1996. The New York Press dubbed him "DJ Stoopid." Times have changed, however. Not that people can "get" the musical collage he spins. DJ Spooky is hot stuff. He can let his music speak for itself. Ultimately, it's some darling noise. PAINTED FROM MEMORY
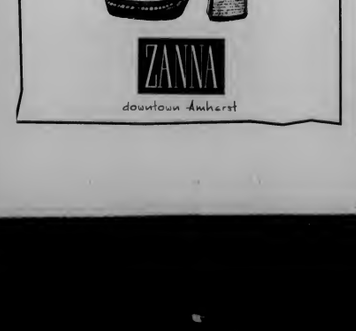
Elvis Costello with Burt Bacharach
Mercury

Things can turn out pretty strange sometimes. More than twenty years after Costello gave us "Alison," he presents us a full album of ballads. The collection is an exquisitely polished production featuring songs composed with the master of Seventies AM-radio schmaltz, Burt Bacharach.

Costello croons on every track. This CD confirms that the days of such pop gems as "Pump It Up" and "Oliver's Army" are long gone. Costello is becoming a notable songwriter and vocalist.

The structure of the love songs are suggestive of the laid-back, cool style we have come to expect from Bacharach. "The Sweetest Punch," is a sweeping affair containing lush string arrangements, horns and a chorus of female vocalists that trade off with Costello. Think of Bacharach's classic "I'll Never Fall In Love" for comparison.



The collaboration for the film, Grace of My Heart, is included here. The song, "God Give Me Strength," was positively received and nominated for an Oscar. An album's worth of material was inevitable.

This is the first release for Costello under a new contract with Mercury that allows him complete creative freedom. Costello has been slipping into his role as crooner for some time now and I imagine this is where he will stay.

A beautiful piece of work. However, I will continue to wallow in nostalgia for Costello's work with The Attractions for a while longer before giving in to the "new" Costello. B+ (Matthew Nixon)

A NIGHT AT THE ROXBURY Original Motion Picture Soundtrack
Dreamworks

Yes! A soundtrack that doubles as a continuous party mix disc. Full of Euro-disco hits by the likes of La Bouche ("Be My Lover") and Ace of Base ("Beautiful Life"), this is a fantastic collection of music. The Butabi brothers' theme song — Haddaway's "What Is Love?" — is included here twice even. Excellent. Along with the certified hits are some other gems of the genre such as Bamboo's "Bamboogie" with its sample of KC and the Sunshine Band's "Get Down Tonight." Cyndi Lauper does a great cover of "Disco Inferno" and N-Trance reworks Rod Stewart's "Do Ya Think I'm Sexy." The beat remains fast the whole time. If you are into the fun, throw-away pop represented here, this is an absolute must have. B+ (M.N.)

MOS DEF & TALIB KWELI ARE BLACK STAR
Black Star
Rawkus

The so-called underground world of hip-hop can be a delicate term. For Mos and Talib it is a term of endearment. You remember that funky young cat on the Bush Babies Gravity released in '96? Or that book-worm seen looking up titles in a Medina bookstore? Two years later, the one-two punch of Mos Def and Talib Kweli are attempting to bring Brooklyn's subterranean scene to the forefront of hip-hop. Over the past year the duo has worked on several projects producing gold mines for underworld DJ's. Black Star is the combined effort of these highly talented wordsmiths.

The album itself attempts to exhibit their artistic independence while conveying that hip-hop has moved towards more of a spiritual plane. After 12-inch masterpieces like "Universal Magnetic," "Fortified Live" and "Manifesto," expectations for similar brilliance are high. For those who have heard "Definition (1,2,3,)" get abused on mix-tapes for the last three months, it is hard to acknowledge its worth. "RE:Definition" is equally dope but not enough to satisfy. The album becomes problematic when its delicate beats override the competent flows of Def and Kweli. Consequently, Black Star does not begin to shine until deep into the album when DJ Hi-Tek takes the production reins.

Both "Hater Players" and "Twice Inna Lifetime" are blazing, but Black Star's true excellence is brought forth on "Respiration," which is one of the tightest lyrical explosions in recent memory. The chorus is picturesque and intelligent and Common, who makes a cameo, gives it extra luster. Although Mos and Common's verses are memorable, Kweli breaks down the city-breathing metaphor: "...it's a paradox we call reality/so keeping it real won't make you a casualty of abnormal normality/killers born naturally like Mickey and Mallory/not knowing the ways will get you capped like an NBA salary..."

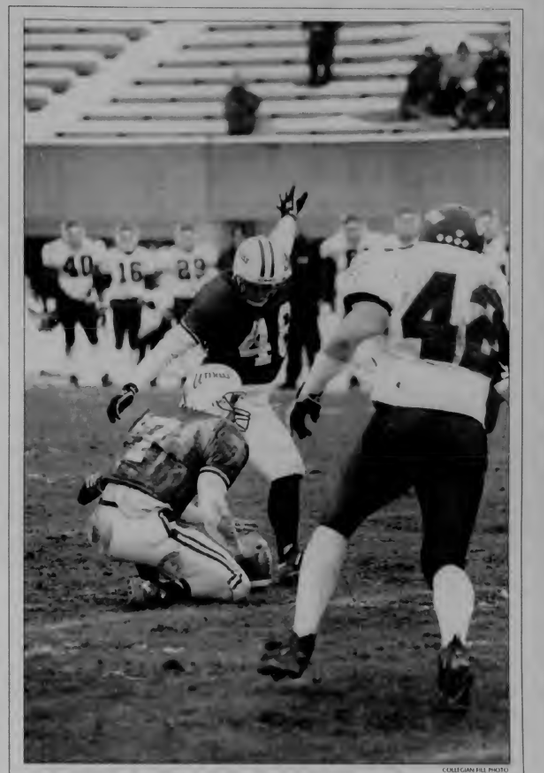
On the whole Black Star is a worthy piece of work, just not the ground-breaking effort we may have expected. B (David Katzoff)

AQUEMNI
Outkast
Laface

It has proven to be a tough task to come back with an album as good as your last. ATLiens, Outkast's follow-up to their bangin' debut Southernplayalisticadillacmuzik, did that. So to come back again would be nearly impossible, right? Not so fast... Big Boi and Dre (the Aquarius and the Gemini) approach their third full length release brimming confidence and unequivocal knowledge of southern life. Along with their '70's pimp-style slanguage, they capture the gospel essence and celebrated soul of the Deep South. Once called the Pink Floyd of rap, Outkast brings poetic realism combined with surreal production by both Organized Noise and themselves. Aquemini proves to be a thoroughly thought-out album that is both lyrically intelligent and musically riveting.

It begins with a serene intro that quickly breaks into the bass-heavy and harmonious "Return of the 'G'." "Rosa Parks," which follows, is a feet stomping serenade and "Skew It on the Bar-B" featuring Raekwon is slick and rhythmic. Some off-course songs like the Title track and the "Art of Storytelling Parts 1,2" are as flavorful as a steaming bowl of grits. "West Savannah" and "Chonkyfire" are both musical adventures in melody and "Synthesizer" with George Clinton is a futuristic funk joint with a message ahead of its time. Another fascinating track is "SpottieOttieDopaliscious" which is an engaging spoken word-style story that contains a horn rif that would leave ska lovers open.

Despite a few Dirty South-influenced choruses and some shaky guest appearances, the overall flow of the album remains in tact. My only warning is for the east coast Purists who cannot warm up to the quick rhymes and Georgian drawls; but let me stress that this is diverse hip-hop and pure southern soul and not that New Orleans pimp/player garbage. Whether we acknowledge it or not, Outkast has returned to keep pace with their last two near classics and if your keeping score, that's 3 for 3. A (D.K.)



SIREN
Heather Nova Work

Blah, blah, blah. This is so tame when compared to other recent releases from women at the moment. A Courtney or Liz, Heather is not. Ultimately, this is fodder for modern rock radio and Heather takes on all sorts of musical identities to find some sort of fit in what the "in" sound may be. Suggestive of an agitated Edie Brickell, Heather's latest release is a real disappointment. C– (M.N.)

FOUNDATION
Brand Nubian
Arista

After its 1991 debut One For All, Brand Nubian decided to break up its core. Grand Puba left on a solo mission and the remaining members kept the name and released two mediocre albums before Ceded X left to record his own solo project. Foundation, which marks the return of all five members, begins with a sinister Primere beat and follows with a surprising array of dope tracks.

The D.I.T.C. fam leads the team of stellar production and Puba's confident presence on the mic is complemented nicely by Ceded X. Lord Jamar, who has never really been a fierce MC, is a bit unpolished but not enough to holdback the overall shine. Foundation's finest moments come on "Don't Let It Go To Your Head," "Probahle Cause" and "Love vs. Hate," which all have nicely executed beats and positive messages. "Maybe One Day" the duet with Common and Grand Puba is slammin' and thought-provoking at the same time. Basically, if you like One For All or you are a sucker for unpretentious hip-hop, Foundation will definitely satisfy. A– (D.K.)

for the affection of a pretty young teacher (Olivia Williams). An unusually well-constructed film, by writer-director Wes Anderson and co-writer Owen Wilson. Stay tuned for Martin to turn 21.

—Dr. Akagi

The title character is another great comic creation, a straw-hatted, white-suited figure dashing about Japan in the final days of World War II, cheered on by a witty, jazzy score. Like a 20th-century Don Quixote, the doctor single-mindedly seeks the cure for hepatitis ("Akagi" is Japanese for "liver") even as Allied planes close in for the finish. The film is by one of Japan's best directors, Shohei Imamura, with an ending as frightening and as mystical as any fantasy of Quixote's.

—My Name Is Joe

Peter Mullan won the acting prize at the Cannes Film Festival for his portrayal of Joe Kavanaugh, a role Paul Newman might have played 30 years ago. Joe is a recovering alcoholic, living on the dole, looking for something (or someone) to turn his life around. That chance comes when he meets a pretty community health worker (Sarah Downie).

This is one of the less political films by Britain's Ken Loach. Class issues arise, but the story is basically about luck and what it can do to people, even those who seem meant for each other. It's also a tribute to Loach, a left-wing director who loves people as much as he does ideas.

We're turning 50 this year!!

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the student radio voice of the University of Massachusetts Amherst. From our early days as an AM carrier-current station broadcasting from the turret in South College to our present location in the Campus Center, WMUA has trained hundreds of students and area residents in all facets of radio, while filling the Pioneer Valley with countless hours of our unique programming.

WMUA is one of the oldest college-licensed broadcast facilities in New England. We have a serious commitment to providing more diverse programming that what you'll find on commercial radio. We broadcast 365 days a year with a range of 20—30 miles around Amherst. WMUA is a perennial winner of the Valley Advocate Reader's Poll for Best College Radio Station.

To celebrate our 50 years in your ears, we will host an open house with tours and continental breakfast from 9 am—Noon on Saturday, October 24th, 1998 (Homecoming Weekend). We are also planning a major WMUA reunion in the spring of 1999, complete with a weekend of WMUA veterans recreating their shows.

Our annual one-week FunDrive is coming up, from October 17—23. Last year over 700 of you pledged $20,000; this year our goal is $25,000. As always, the FunDrive begins with our 14-hour Polkathon. Donations will net you one of our fine premiums, including CDs, tickets & gift certificates, as well as WMUA t-shirts, hats & mugs. We are proud to serve the campus and local communities, by providing both training and a quality media alternative. Please continue to listen and support us in our efforts.

them retired two years ago.

"I love playing the game again," said Cunningham, who signed with Minnesota as a backup last year. "I'm around great people and great coaches and a great offensive line."

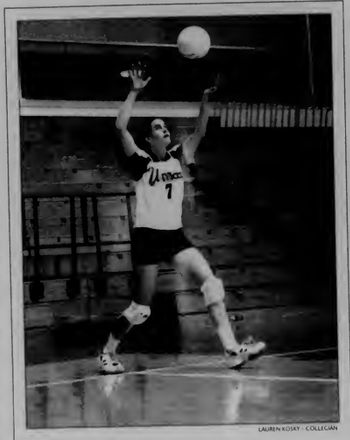
And, of course, three great receivers, who dominated on a muddy field, as the Vikings rolled up 545 yards in intermittent rain and occasional showers against a defense that entered the game ranked No. 1 in the NFL.

Cunningham, who is replacing the injured Brad Johnson, had TD passes of 52 and 44 yards to Moss, 56 yards to Reed and 24 yards on a screen pass to Robert Smith. Three of the TDs came in the second quarter as the Vikings broke a 3-3 tie to lead 24-10 at halftime. Cunningham, who was 20-of-32, has 10 TD passes without an interception since replacing Johnson, who broke his right leg in Week 2.

"Any team that plays the Vikings better get some pressure on the quarterback," said Packers coach Mike Holmgren, whose team didn't get a hand on Cunningham. "Those big receivers are going to cause a problem unless you do, and we didn't get any pressure tonight."

Cunningham also had a 75-yard TD pass that was wiped out by a holding penalty and had what would have been a 66-yarder slip off the fingers of Moss, the rookie who dropped to 21st overall in the draft because of personal problems. Moss finished with five catches for 190 yards.

"This was Randy's coming-out party, and Randall Cunningham did a great job," Vikings coach Dennis Green said.



"I don't know what he means about my coming-out party. But I'm going home to a party," Moss said.

Packers cornerback Tyrone Williams could be the guest of honor, too.

"Somehow we got figure out a way when they throw it up like that, we've got to climb that ladder," Williams said. "I was in position, the guy just went up and got it."

The only Green Bay touchdown until the game was decided came on a 101-yard kickoff return by Roell Preston.

More than the Packers' pride was hurt, too.

New Orleans ironman goes down

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — New Orleans Saints center Jerry Fontenot, an ironman of sorts since entering the NFL in Chicago in 1989, likely will miss the rest of the season because of a knee injury. Saints trainer Dean Kleinschmidt said an MRI revealed Fontenot tore the medial collateral ligament in his right knee and possibly incurred additional damage during Sunday's game against New England, coach Mike Ditka said Monday.

Fontenot, a native of Lafayette, played 128 consecutive games with the Bears and all 20 with the Saints since signing as a free agent in 1997. He has not missed a start since the 10th game of the '91 season in Chicago.

"There is talk of possibly immobilizing the knee, but it looks like it's a season-ending injury for Jerry," Ditka said. "I haven't had a chance to talk with Jerry, but that's what it looks like."

Fontenot, 31, was injured on the fourth play of the Saints' first possession Sunday. He came off the field under his own power and watched the remainder of the game from the bench, the second half in street clothes.

Racial slurs blemish pro hockey image once again

MIAMI (AP) — The NHL, which last year suspended two Washington Capitals players for using racial slurs, has another case on its hands before the regular season even begins.

The Florida Panthers allege two Tampa Bay Lightning players used slurs against winger Peter Worrell, who is black. Panthers president Bill Torrey voiced his anger to commissioner Gary Bettman following yesterday's Board of Governors meeting in New York. Darcy Tucker and Sandy McCarthy are accused of using slurs during Friday's exhibition in Jacksonville.

NHL investigators hope to reach a conclusion before the teams meet again Friday night in their season opener. Either player could be suspended if evidence supports the charges.

"Our security department is still gathering facts," NHL spokesman Frank Brown said. "That process remains in progress."

Eyewitnesses, who include members of the Panthers' front office, allege Tucker and McCarthy began taunting Worrell by gestuning like an ape while all three were in the penalty box. Later, Tucker allegedly used a racial slur against Worrell in the Jacksonville Coliseum hallway.

"We want to go to the league in this situation in confidence and tell them what we think happened or was said," Panthers general manager Bryan Murray said. "It's up to them how they want to handle it."

McCarthy and Tucker denied the charges.

"When I was growing up I had to go through that," said McCarthy, whose father is black and mother is Canadian Indian. "I would never go there. I want to see the person who says I did that stand in front of my face and tell me I said that because I would never do that. I would never say that to this man."

Worrell said he had nothing to do with the accusations and denied hearing any slurs or seeing any racial gestures made toward him.

"I didn't hear or see anything. I don't think it's an issue," Worrell said. "I just want to make the team."

Brown said it would take a few days for investigators to talk to those who might have heard either exchange. The fact that the game was not at a regular NHL venue, where game officials would be more readily available, also was a disadvantage.

"This is a time-consuming procedure," he said. "There are a lot of people involved. Aside from the uniformed participants, we need to locate people who work at the venue who might have been within earshot of these alleged remarks."

Lightning general manager Phil Esposito called the incident an attempt at gamesmanship by the Panthers.

"This is typical Florida Panthers bull," Esposito said. "This is just them trying to get us off our game because we're playing them in the opener. It's not right."

NLCS teams prepare differently

ATLANTA (AP) — The cackles come from all parts of the park because these San Diego Padres clearly are having a ball.

Andy Ashby hoots after outjumping Wally Joyner for a fly. Jim Leyritz shouts when he launches a drive to left. Carlos Hernandez dances and does his best "Rocky" imitation.

An hour earlier Monday, it was the Atlanta Braves' turn to prepare for the National League championship series.

Greg Maddux neatly dropped a bunt down the third-base line. Keith Lockhart worked on his double-play pivot. Walt Weiss practiced his hit-and-run swing.

Mostly in silence, by the way.

Which once again begs the question, going into Game 1 tonight at Turner Field: Are these Atlanta Braves too even-tempered for their own good in October?

Built for success over the long haul of the regular season — seven straight trips to the NLCS prove that — many have wondered whether the Braves are lacking the emotional element that some say is necessary to win it all.

"I think this business-type attitude hasn't gotten the job done the last couple of years," Atlanta third baseman Chipper Jones admitted.

Pitching and hitting and fielding are no problem, as 106 victories this year attest. But, as only one World Series championship may indicate to their fans and opponents, perhaps these Braves teams are minus one key ingredient.

"You have to have that extra emotion at this time of year," said Leyritz, a postseason hero with six home runs in 36 at-bats. "Maybe that extra edge is what's missing sometimes," he said. "They have been here before, but they haven't won the World Series that many times."

Of course, it takes more than a lot of rah-rah attitude to win games. Yet listen to Tony Gwynn talk about the Padres' mental state right now: "We're coming in euphoric, man."

Certainly no one would think of "euphoric" when describing the Braves. "Efficient" and "effective," for sure, but not "euphoric."

Ashby is actually worried about getting too enthused for his start in the opener.

"The main thing for me is just control my emotions and my excitement to a point where I can go out and do my job," said Ashby, 2-0 against Atlanta this year. "But it's a great feeling, and there's nothing like it."

The Padres partied for 90 minutes after beating Houston in the first round of the NL playoffs, parading around the field at San Diego while pitcher Kevin Brown and others spoke to the fans on the public-address system.

The Braves also celebrated with champagne after their first-round win over Chicago, showing more spirit than in recent years. John Smoltz, 2-0 against the Padres this year going into his start in Game 1, said there was a reason.

"We changed our roster pretty dramatically in the offseason. We have a lot of guys that have not been through this," he said. "It's going to create more excitement for them, for us."

NBA players pushing to end lockout

PURCHASE, N.Y. (AP) — On the day NBA training camps were supposed to open, dozens of players around the country took their case to the public yesterday with a simple message: We are not to blame.

"We're here to show the public that we, as players, want to play," union president Patrick Ewing said. "We just want everybody to know that the players want the season to start on time."

Ewing spoke in a parking lot outside the New York Knicks' practice facility — which was indeed locked — as part of a media blitz that was unprecedented for a union that historically has been considered disorganized and weak.

In all, players appeared at 14 training camp sites and NBA arenas in an attempt to influence public opinion over a labor battle that has grown increasingly acrimonious since the lockout began July 1 when the collective bargaining agreement expired.

Talks are scheduled to resume tomorrow, and an agreement must be reached in a few days to prevent the cancellation of regular-season games for the first time in league history. The NBA already has canceled the entire exhibition season.

"They locked us out. It's not like we're on strike," said Rockets free agent Mario Elie, one of several players who have been working out together at Houston's Westside Tennis Club.

"Everybody's got to get that corrected. It's not on us. The onus is on them. They're the ones that closed us down."

Seattle center Jim McIlvaine spoke outside the Bucks' locked practice facility in Racine, Wis., where players stood in the rain.

"I was more optimistic than pessimistic over the summer, but lately that's turned around," he said. "This Thursday's meeting will be big. The only way we're going to get the season started on time."

But such a dramatic turn seems highly unlikely with the sides far apart on the main economic issues. In a league with almost $2 billion in annual revenues, the owners want to install a "hard" salary cap system with an absolute limit on how much money is paid to players.

The players, meanwhile, want to keep as much of the old system intact as possible, including the so-called "Larry Bird exception" that allows teams to exceed the salary cap to retain their own free agents. Such a rule allowed Michael Jordan to make $33 million last season when the cap was $26.9 million.

The NBA did not immediately comment.

"We're battling an enormous P.R. machine," said free agent Steve Kerr, one of only two members of the defending champion Chicago Bulls to appear at Berto Center in suburban Deerfield, Ill., where the Bulls practice.

"I don't expect any sympathy at all from anybody," Kerr said.

"The fact is, though, we're the 400 top people in our profession in the entire world and we're in a billion-dollar industry. There is no reason why we should be restricted in what we're making while the owners are cashing in."

The sessions were open to the public, which some fans used as an opportunity to get autographs while others seized upon it as an extraordinary chance to have their voices heard.

One Knicks' season-ticket holder made his case directly to union director Billy Hunter, who appeared with Ewing. And though Hunter was sympathetic to the pleadings that no one seemed concerned about the fans, he admonished the man that he was answerable only to his constituency — the players.

Cards local Hall will hold HR 70 while fan thinks

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Attendance figures are expected to pick up considerably at the St. Louis Cardinals Hall of Fame now that Mark McGwire's 70th home run ball is going on display.

While the fan who ended up with the record ball sifts through offers, he's giving others a chance to see it. Phil Ozersky, a 26-year-old DNA lab researcher at Washington University, on Monday loaned the ball to the Hall of Fame across the street from Busch Stadium.

"When I caught the ball, the first thing I thought was that if I was just a fan, I'd want to see it," Ozersky said. "It's a great idea to have it here. I hope everybody comes down and sees the ball."

The display opens next Monday, and it might be a limited engagement. Gerald Baltz, the museum's executive director, said he didn't expect to have the ball for more than a month or so. Ozersky's attorney, David Krathen of Miami, said his client has received countless proposals since snaring No. 70 in the St. Louis Cardinals' finale Sept. 27. There's been everything but a call from McGwire, who has said he's not interested in paying for the ball.

"He's been besieged by agents, auction houses, individuals," Krathen said. "You name it, they've contacted us.

"I think the right thing to do is take your time, take a deep breath, step back and see what the various options are."

Ozersky would like the ball to end up at the Baseball Hall of Fame at Cooperstown, N.Y., but he's not as willing as some of the other ball recipients to just give it away.

"I remember one of my first impressions very well. It was during my interview. I was sitting across the table from an Assistant Vice President. He looked straight at me, put my resume aside, and said, 'I'd like to just talk'.
When he said he wanted to know about me as a person, I couldn't believe it. When I left that office I knew one thing — this was definitely the company for me!"

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — You will witness something rather important today, but you may not know what your role will be when the time comes.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — You are likely to receive more encouragement than expected today. With new enthusiasm you should be able to accomplish something quite remarkable.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — You may have to say something again and again before the day is out, if only to be sure that you've been heard. Don't get frustrated.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — You may need to get an early start today in order to maximize your own organization, and the organization of a major project involving many others.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — This is a good day to think back on past travels and accomplishments. You'll realize that you are on the threshold of something big.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — Take care that you're not just butting heads with a rival simply for the sport of it. Do nothing today that will prevent you from gaining tangible results.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — You're going to have to work harder today to win the results you seek — though later in the day you'll have the chance to sit back and relax.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — Don't hesitate to forgive someone who offended you unintentionally. Now is no time to hold a grudge. You can prove that you're "above it" all.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — You're in for a surprise today, and you must be sure that you're also in the best possible position to receive it — with your unforgettable, charismatic style!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — You'll be called upon to make up your mind rather quickly today — even before you truly understand all the subtle points of the day's affairs.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — You may have to change your plans today, but you can still focus on a long-term goal. Take care that you don't let your feelings betray you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — It's essential that you remain flexible today. The adjustments you make at this time may not be dramatic, but they may have a dramatic impact.

Red Sox are out, Vaughn expected to leave Fenway

OK, so the Red Sox aren't going to win the World Series. What team did you expect me to pick? If I picked someone else, it would be like Beano

Aaron Saykin
on
Major League Baseball

Cook picking someone other than Notre Dame to win the college football National Championship.

Not to worry Sox fans, there's still hope — the New York crack fiends could still lose. So, now we at least have someone to root against.

It's usually my standard policy not to mention the Red Sox until a month after the season is over because I'm too heated to deal with the topic. But, since the girl across the hall told me that I need to confront my emotions, I guess I'll talk about them a bit.

First order of business: Mighty Mo Vaughn. I think he's gone. I really do, and so do most justifiably pessimistic Sox fans. I was at the last game Roger Clemens pitched for Boston, and I will never forget the ovation he received, nor will I forget the Fenway Park atmosphere, where everyone could sense his impending departure. We didn't know for sure that he was leaving, but in the back of our minds, we began to imagine life without the Rocket.

After Vaughn was lifted for a pinch runner in the eighth inning of Saturday's game against the Indians, I got the same sense from the Fenway faithful.

So whom can Danny Duquette find to replace Mo? Well, that's easy. No one! He's looking at hot free agents like Bernie Williams, and Mike Piazza. It doesn't make any sense to gamble in the free agent market. As the hillbillies always preach: "Why roam when you can get it at home?"

Anyway, what I really want to write about today, are the 20 most important or unusual things that I learned from this season. Here's how they rank:

No. 20: That Sox closer Tom Gorden can save all the games he wants during the regular season, but it won't matter if he can't get three outs in the playoffs.

No. 19: That my friend M.L. from the Townhouses thinks "Jeter has a cute butt."

No. 18: That Dennis Eckersley should have quit while he was ahead.

No. 17: That you can't let clutch players like Jim Leyritz slip away.

No. 16: That Mark McGwire's son is a little porker.

No. 15: That I have little respect for players like Wade Boggs, who are playing not for the love of the game, but merely to reach the 3,000-hit mark. No Cooperstown for sell-outs!

No. 14: That Roger Clemens is one of the five best pitchers ever to play the game.

No. 13: That Rafters is one of the best places for skipping class to watch the Sox win a playoff game.

No. 12: That marital problems can really mess with a man's head. C'mon Mark Wohlers and Frank Thomas, just pay the ladies off, send 'em on their way, and go find a new ball and chain for some treats.

No. 11: That Andruw Jones needs an attitude adjustment. How can Bobby Cox let him get away with jogging after a ball hit over his head. Up yours, Andruw! There are plenty of other center fielders around.

No. 10: That it's bad enough we don't get ESPN on campus... and then they take away CNNSI. Up yours, HSCN!

No. 9: That I actually thought I knew what obstructed view seats were until I let my buddy, Bernie, get Sox tickets. We actually sat behind the big view screen in center field... yes, it's possible.

No. 8: That the loyal Padre and Cub fans deserved a season like 1998.

No. 7: That Kerry Wood may be the next Clemens.

No. 6: That Nomar Garciaparra is one of the top AL MVP candidates and he isn't even an All-Star. Up yours, Mike Hartigrove for not choosing him!

No. 5: That UMass football coach Mark Whipple should manage the Sox. Why not? He wins wherever he goes.

No. 4: That Sammy Sosa had one of the best all-around seasons by a player, ever... and still may not be NL MVP.

No. 3: That Cal Ripken finally took what he deserved, a well-earned day off. We'll never forget what he's done for baseball.

No. 2: That no one, and I mean no one, will ever hit more than 70 home runs in a season. Big Mac, you're the greatest home run hitter ever, in my opinion... now let's start the countdown to 756.

And the No. 1 thing that I learned in 1998: That no baseball player will ever accept a tobacco product from President Clinton to put in his mouth.

UMass goes under the lights to face Terriers

Most people can hardly remember what they've done over the past 17 days, nor can the Massachusetts field hockey team.

That's not because of a lapse in memory. It's because coach Patty Shea and her Minutewomen (4–4) haven't played a game since falling to host Maryland on Sept. 20.

"We went through a pretty tough stretch in the beginning of the season," said Shea, whose team played eight games in an 11 day span before the large break. "Originally, it was supposed to be a 10-day break, but a game was cancelled from our schedule. I think it helped the players. Classes started so late this year, and we were on the road so much that our student athletes needed some time to get settled."

And what better way to restart the 1998 campaign than by hosting a state-rival in the first home night game in school field hockey history. In what is anticipated to have one the largest turnouts ever in the stands of Richard F. Garber Field, UMass will play host tonight to a highly-touted Boston University team (5–4, 3–1 America East), looking to rebound from an 8–0 defeat at the hands of Old Dominion.

"This is an important game. This is a big regional game, and is always a tough one," said Shea, who referred to the annual clash between two in-state powerhouse programs. "Regardless of the records, it's going to be a close game. Anything can happen within the region. Teams just beat up on each other."

Despite the large gap between games, Shea feels that her team should show no ill-effects from the layoff as the result of a carefully planned practice schedule.

"Over the break, we started by working with individual components, and then put them together as a team," she said. "We have to look at this game as the beginning of our season. We learned a lot from the first eight games, and now we have to carry that over to the (BU) game."

While attempting to earn a victory over one of the top teams in the area, the Minutewomen must contend with the explosive front line of the Terriers, who have outscored their opponents 21–6 during their five victories. BU junior forward and leading-scorer Danielle Decoste powers a Terrier offense which Shea feels utilizes its speed very effectively.

"Their midfielders and forwards are extremely fast and scrappy," she said. "They can make your life a living hell. Defensively, we can't fall asleep."

Shea also feels that the 17-day break has allowed some of her injured players to heal. Senior forward Erica Johnston, who suffered a concussion in the season-opener and was sidelined for three games, has had over two weeks of practice to iron out any of the wrinkles on the road to recovery.

As for the atmosphere which surrounds any night game at the collegiate level, Shea feels that the program will benefit greatly from the a game under the lights.

"We're hoping for a great turnout. It's the first night game at UMass in school history," said Shea. "We want to showcase one of the many great teams on campus. Night games increase fan support because parents can come watch, and it also gives the players an advantage academically because they don't miss any of their classes. I'd love to see it happen more often."

UM football ranked 24

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

For the first time since the beginning of the 1995 football season, Massachusetts is nationally ranked.

After posting a 3–1 record over the first four games of the year, including last Saturday's wild 40–35 comeback victory over No. 5 Hofstra, the Sports Network ranked UMass 24th in Division I–AA college football.

In addition, the Minutemen claimed the third spot among I–AA football teams and the 71st position in Division I football according to Jeff Sagarin's College Football Rankings.

The only Massachusetts loss came in week one at the hands of Delaware, then the No. 5 team in the nation, by a score of 33–30.

"I'm not going to tell you I didn't think it was a slap in the face when we were not in the top 50 teams in the country last week," Coach Mark Whipple said. "I mentioned it to (the team), and I don't like to be second in anything, and I don't think the kids like to be second in anything. We're trying to get up there, and I know those rankings help out."

Success is nothing new to Whipple, as he joined the UMass program with a combined 72–33 record over stints with Brown and New Haven. The offensive wizard has coached in the Division II playoffs twice in his previous ten seasons at the helm of the two respective schools.

When in New Haven, his teams were ranked in the top 20 nationally in five of his six years with the program, reaching as high as No. 2.

Now with his Minutemen breaking into the top 25, he has breathed new life into a program that had fallen into a four- year lapse into mediocrity, compiling a 19–25 record over that span.

"Getting into the polls is a start," Whipple said. "Now let's hope we can move up."

Minuteman notes:

Minutemen Wille Hemmer and Bryan King have joined Adrian Zullo and Jeremy Robinson as UMass players who have claimed weekly awards in the young 1998 season.

Hemmer and King were named Division I–AA Special Teams Players of the Week by ESPN/USA Today, after each recovered blocked punts for touchdowns in the Minutemen's victory over Hofstra. Hemmer scored UMass' first touchdown of the game in the third quarter with his effort, and King tied the ballgame early in the fourth period, contributing to the team's comeback surge that was ultimately successful.

Minutewomen fight through ailments

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

KINGSTON, RI — The temperature may have been close to the freezing point last night at the University of Rhode Island soccer complex, but thanks to a red hot second half, the Massachusetts women's soccer team came away with a well-deserved 3–1 win over the Rams.

For most teams who've been down on their luck, it would've been easy to let up during the final 45 minutes of last night's game. But that wasn't the case for the Minutewomen. UMass (5–7, 2–1 in the Atlantic 10) saw three of its players forced to the bench in the first half because of sickness, but rallied back to dominate play in the second stanza and net a pair of goals.

"One thing about us is that we'll play hard every game," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "We had Emma (Kurowski), Katelyn (Jones) and Molly (McGrew) leave the game and things changed right before the half. But we really came back and responded well."

With the game tied 1–1 at the intermission, UMass came out strong in the second half and totally outhustled the Rams. The Minutewomen were then rewarded for their aggressive play midway through the second half, when senior co-captain Amanda Thompson tallied the game winner on a free kick with 25:09 left in the game. That kick was a result of a foul against a URI player who took down midfielder Tarah Tokarchik.

"I've been working on that since the summer and even through all of preseason because Coach told me that would probably be the only way for me to get a goal this year," said Thompson, who is the team's sweeper. "I missed about three or four (free kicks) over the past few games, but I had confidence in myself tonight."

The Minutewomen then put the game away late in the second half. Tokarchik once again proved to be a thorn in the Rams' side, as she drew another key foul while in pursuit of a loose ball. This takedown resulted in a penalty kick which Kurowski slid home for the clincher.

"Everybody really wanted this one," said senior co-captain Sophie Lecot, who scored the first UMass goal. "We knew we had an advantage in the midfield, and Tarah did a good job of getting open. She was a big threat."

"First we got the free kick to win it and then the penalty kick to lock it up. Those goals were a direct product of our tactics," Rudy said.

Aside from the offensive heroics from Thompson and Kurowski in the second half, UMass also received spectacular efforts from their defensive core as well as junior goalkeeper Angie Napoli. A Longmeadow, Mass. product, who made several outstanding saves in the second half to help keep the Rams in check.

The game really was in doubt in the second half. Angie made a couple saves that could've turned the game around," Rudy said. "If those shots had gone in, then we would've had to fight from behind again."

"I was more nervous on Friday (2–1 loss to Temple). I was thinking too much about making mistakes and I wasn't focused," Napoli said. "Tonight I decided to keep my focus and it was finally our time."

Lecot opened the scoring at the 27:22 mark of the opening half on a goal that was set up by Kurowski, but the Rams responded just over nine minutes later on a goal by Kathleen Patton.

The Minutewomen will next be in action this weekend, as they take on George Washington at home on Friday, and Virginia Tech on Sunday.

Monday Night Football sees the reemergence of Cunningham

GREEN BAY, Wis. (AP) — Reggie White has seen a lot of Randall Cunningham's magic, but he never expected anything like this.

"He played out of his mind. This is the best I've ever seen him play," White said after his former Philadelphia teammate threw for 442 yards and four touchdowns in the Minnesota Vikings' 37-24 rout of the Green Bay Packers on Monday night.

White wasn't alone.

In the franchise's 80-year history, no quarterback had ever torched the Packers for that many yards. The loss snapped their 29-game home winning streak that included four playoff victories.

"He did a great job dropping back and just slinging it, and he just killed us," White said. "Their receivers outjumped our corners, we didn't do a good enough job getting pressure."

White saw a reformed scrambler stay in the pocket — for what seemed like forever — and pick apart the league's No. 1 defense with deep jump-ball passes that All-Pro receiver Cris Carter, rookie sensation Randy Moss and forgotten man Jake Reed wrested away from deflated defensive backs.

Back when White and Cunningham were with the Eagles, the athletic quarterback used to take off at the first sign of trouble, but no more.

"They're stressing to him to stay in the pocket, and he's doing an excellent job back there," White said.

And his receivers are doing a first-class job, too.

They were the chief reason the Vikings (5-0), the NFC's only unbeaten team, ended the Lambeau Field streak by the Packers (4-1), who last lost here on Sept. 10, 1995, to St. Louis.

"Everyone's a little down," said Brett Favre, who had three interceptions. "It's been a long time since we've lost at home. We were just hoping it wouldn't happen during our career."

UM volleyball set to visit URI

By James Murphy
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team is on a roll.

After losing six of their first eight matches, the Minutewomen have won five of their last seven. Three of those five wins have been conference wins, improving their A–10 record to 4–2.

Today, the Minutewomen roll into Kingston, R.I. to face the Lady Rams of the University of Rhode Island. UMass will try to build off the momentum of two huge conference victories last weekend, in which they defeated Fordham and George Washington, both by 3–2 scores.

Of the two wins, GW served as the biggest confidence builder.

GW is known to be a physical team and it a much bigger team than UMass, so one might have given the Colonials the edge in such a tightly played match.

The Minutewomen had other ideas, though, as they continued to display the resilience and teamwork that has helped them build their largest win streak of the season and hopefully make a statement within the A–10 with a win today at URI.

The Minutewomen can improve their overall record to 8–8. This would put them at 500 for the first time since Sept. 5 and would also put their conference record at a 5–2 mark.

Minutewomen Notes:

Freshman Heather Holtsberg, of Wheaton, Illinois, was named the Atlantic–10 Volleyball Rookie of the Week on Monday afternoon. Holtsberg had never received this honor before.

The 5-foot–7-inch setter helped the Minutewomen earn two A–10 five–set road wins this past weekend, over conference rivals George Washington and Fordham.

Holtsberg assisted on a total of 108 kills and tied her career high against GW with 55 assists. She also registered her third double–double of her career with 13 digs and 53 assists in the victory over Fordham.

Following a combined 53 kills in the two matches against Fordham and George Washington, junior Jill Meyers leads the team in kills with 227 and kills per game at 3.78 average.

With that performance, Meyers is now third on UMass' career kills list with 1,090, surpassing former Minutewomen standout Giza Rivera.

Junior Karl Hogancamp now sits third on the University of Massachusetts career dig chart with 1,528. Hogancamp compiled 42 digs last weekend putting her at 245 for the season.

She also showed her multi–dimensional style of play by tallying 28 kills on the 2–game road trip. She now stands second in kills on the season behind Meyers, with 188.

Pakistan army loses a leader

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — Pakistan's powerful army chief resigned yesterday in a dispute over the military's role, a surprise move that provoked concerns of political turmoil. Opposition figures accused the government of forcing Gen. Jehangir Karamat to step down and warned that the resignation would generate political uncertainty.

"There is a genuine fear" of a government takeover by the army to protest the resignation and the appointment of a replacement who was not first in line, said Naveed Qamar, a spokesman for former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto's Pakistan Peoples' Party. "It is still uncertain how the military is going to react."

The general resigned just two days after he called for the creation of a military-dominated council that would play a key role in determining government policy.

Though the military ruled Pakistan for half its 51-year history, it never took a direct role in government during periods of civilian rule, preferring to exert pressure behind the scenes. This was the first time that an army chief of staff has resigned in Pakistan. During previous major disagreements, the army leader has simply took power and exerted his will.

College costs still increasing

WASHINGTON (AP)— The price of college grew at a slower pace this year, but the ticket to a higher education still costs 50 percent more than a decade ago.

The four percent average increase this year means tuition and fees rose $132 at public four year-institutions, reaching an average of $3,243, the College Board reported yesterday.

For private, four-year colleges, average tuition and fees rose $723, up five percent to $14,508. Those costs averaged $1,633 at public two-year colleges, up four percent, or $66. A four percent increase also occurred at private two-year colleges, where average tuition and fees rose $254 to $7,333.

These costs rose even as overall inflation is averaging less than two percent this year, as it did last year.

Tuition and fees rose an average of two percent last year and six percent each of three years before that. Because of an earlier round of double-digit growth, tuition at public four-year institutions in the last decade has risen 50 percent, adjusted for inflation. Family income during that time rose only 1.5 percent, also adjusted for inflation.

Financial aid has also grown, offsetting some of the increases, the College Board said. But students are borrowing more and getting fewer grants. Neediest students are suffering most.

SGA holds first meeting

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Last night, new senators and area government members were officially sworn in at the first University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) Senate meeting.

Forty–two senators attended the meeting which mostly served to introduce new SGA members to constitutional and meeting policies. Senators also heard from members of various committees, but only three motions were made.

The first motion made was to appoint Barbara Karuri to the Student Judiciary board. Karuri was appointed by SGA President Salwa Shamapande and received a unanimous positive recommendation from the coordination council (made up of all the committee chairs).

The senate passed the vote, with only one objection, after looking at Karuri's resume and hearing her speak.

The senate passed a second motion to select R.J. Lemar, also appointed by Shamapande and recommended by the coordination council, to the student judiciary board. Lemar spoke to the senate members about his experience politically on campus. With a small segment of senate voting against Lemar, and one abstention, he was voted in.

The third motion was to break ties that existed in three of the senate and area government races. Dan Singleton was elected senator from Pierpont Residence Hall. The other two positions, in the Central Residential Area, could not be decided because none of the candidates were present at the meeting.

Seth Presser, chancellor of elections, spoke to the senators and members of area government about mistakes found in the elections report.

"Errors take place," he said. "I've taken responsibility for everything. There was a board of commissioners that worked on this with me also."

In Shamapande's report, he called the senate's attention to the relationship between the township of Amherst and the students.

"We've been working with the town very diligently," he said. "They are very stubborn in their position and view us somewhat as a menace. We need students, especially commuters, to start coming to partnership meetings. We definitely need to have a lot of people there."

Shamapande also said he is interested in a reevaluation of the SGA constitution.

"Working together," he said, "we can put together a perfect document."

Along with Shamapande, student trustee Eleanor Court, speaker of the senate Lisa Cook, associate speaker Jodi Bailey, members of the executive cabinet, and SCERA (Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy) student coordinator Resa Singleton spoke on what their jobs entail.

Representatives from the women's, ways and means, finance, administrative affairs, and university policy committees spoke on their contributions to campus life and also urged senators to get involved.

Also in attendance at the meeting was Charles Demare, director of student legal services, who spoke to the senators about their rights and abilities to pass laws for the University.

No accord reached on violations

By Paul Teves

AMHERST — Penalties were handed down to five local bars for not complying with the town's smoking ban last night at an Amherst Health Board meeting at the Bangs Community Center.

The five bars — Rafters, Mike's Westview, Delano's, The Spoke and the Olde Amherst Ale House — had earlier in the day filed for an injunction, which claimed that the health board had improperly enacted and improperly enforced the regulations against smoking.

"They're trying to get these regulations ruled invalid, but the health board properly enacted and enforced them," said Alan Seewald, who is serving as council for the town of Amherst.

Early in the meeting, two board members insisted they did not want the violations to go unpunished.

"I feel that we must set penalties today, because there have been bars and establishments which have been able to follow the regulations, and to let this matter go on would be unfair to them," said board member Orlando Sola–Gomez.

Three of the other four board members seemed intent on working out the issue of the smoking ban. They talked about raising the penalties if the bars showed efforts to comply with the regulations set by the board, or if they demonstrated what board member David Buchanan called a "show of good faith by paying fines incurred from smoking ban tickets."

All five of the restaurants were going through the penalty system for several offenses. Only at Mike's Westview had these occurances of smoking occurred consistantly according to the Health Director Epi Bodhi.

All the bar owners were represented at the meeting. They all shared similar opinions on the issue. None of the bar owners said they would pay their existing smoking fines, due to their impending legal fees, but all were hoping to get the board to lean toward different penalties.

"I had an engineer brought in and I had him take a look at the cost of a better air system. Maybe the board can take a second look at the smoking ban, and allow for some place to have variance," said Jerry Jolly, owner of Rafters.

Board chairperson Valerie Steinberg responded by attempting to create a dialog about this idea. But Gomez insisted that assessing penalties was the only fair thing to do, because other bars had complied.

Seewald suggested that due to impending injunction the board should not assess penalties at this time.

The board concurred by setting penalties, but the penalties are suspended for three weeks until the next meeting on Nov. 4.

"If, in the interim, the establishments show good faith and compliance then we might consider not invoking those penalties," Buchanan said.

"My clients are just looking to stay in business, first and foremost. Were hoping to find a compromise with the Board of Health," said Steven Winniman, attorney for the establishments

The goal of finding a compromise was not met last night. The penalties the board hoped to hand down were also not realized. The next step in this case will be taken on Oct. 19 when the injunction will be brought before a judge in Northampton.

AIDS deaths decreasing

By Laura Meckler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The number of Americans dying of AIDS fell a dramatic 47 percent last year as powerful new drugs kept the disease at bay for thousands of patients.

It's the second straight year that AIDS deaths have dropped — this time nearly twice as fast as in 1996 and enough to push the disease out of the top 10 causes of death in this country for the first time since 1990, the government said yesterday.

Still, last year also saw some 40,000 new infections, a number that isn't dropping, meaning more people are living with and potentially spreading AIDS and the virus that causes it. And doctors worry the wonder-drug combinations that have been so successful will eventually stop working.

The government's annual review of births and deaths also found continued declines in homicides, infant mortality and births to teen-agers.

The drop in AIDS deaths happened across gender and race, although the rate among white men fell most. Overall, 16,685 Americans died of AIDS last year, or about 46 each day. Just two years earlier, it was 118 per day.

Two years ago, John West was retiring from his job, finalizing his will and arranging for the right disco music at his memorial service. He took what he thought was a final trip to his beloved Paris to say goodbye to friends.

"I made my plans to die," said the San Francisco man who contracted HIV in the epidemic's early days and

Native American Nessatako discusses U.S. genocide

By Melissa Sherman
Collegian Correspondent

Last night an audience packed into the Student Union Ballroom to hear Native American activist Nessatako speak of Christopher Columbus' legacy, which he believes marks the beginning of 500 years of genocide still occurring today.

Nessatako which means "Pulls the Feather," is from the Onondaga Nation, located near Syracuse, N.Y. The Onondaga are part of the Iroquois Confederacy, whose own form of government inspired framers of the U.S. Constitution.

According to the law and the U.S. constitution, the sovereignty of other nations is suppose to be respected. In the United States, Nessatako feels that is not the case. Thousands upon thousands of square miles have been stolen outright from the natives of this country, without a treaty or purchase.

Nessatako believes that the U.S. is built on the genocide of over 500 nations. Foreigners flooded out the natives to move into power. The form, but not the practice, has changed today. Nessatako believes that we all have to unite nationally to end what foreigners such as Columbus started 500 hundred years ago when they forced the native peoples out from there land. He believes in anti–imperialism and self determination of all nations.

Nessatako is also a celebrated artist. One portrait in particular sums up the feelings of Nessatako and the Onondaga Nation. It is the painting of Two Row Wampum holding an agreement.

This symbolizes the agreement in which the Iroquois welcomed the white people to their lands 500 years ago.

"We will not be like father and son but like brothers. These two rows will symbolize vessels," the inscription on the painting says. "Traveling down the same river together. One will be for the original people. Their laws. Their customs. And the other for the European people and their laws and customs. We will each travel the river together. But each in our own boat. And neither of us will try to steer the other's vessel.

"The agreement has been kept by the Iroquois to this date."

During the lecture Nessatako showed a recent news clip in which the Onondaga Nation was the subject of police brutality during a protest with the state of New York over a tax dispute. Police groups raided and attacked the Onondaga and closed Route 81. Police opened fire and insisted they were shooting at trees, however the bullets in the trees suggested otherwise.

Nessatako and the Onondaga felt that tax money was not distributed among people as it should be according to the Original

Cuts to hurt U.S. growth

By Dave Skidmore
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Offering hope of further interest-rate cuts, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan warned yesterday that a "fear-induced psychological response" gripping the world's financial markets is bound to cramp the U.S. economy.

"We are clearly facing a set of forces that should be damping demand going forward," Greenspan said. "We do not know how far it will go, or how much it will affect consumer and business spending here at home."

But he told a group of business economists: "This is a time for monetary policy to be especially alert."

His comments almost interrupted a string of stock-market losses that have occurred this week as the annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund failed to produce a clear strategy to combat the crisis.

The Dow Jones average of industrial stocks shot up 113 points immediately after his speech, then settled back and closed at 7,740, down three points.

"He all but said, 'We very likely are going to lower rates again,'" said economist Ailen Sinai of Primark Economic Associates in New York. "And interest rates — always — are more important than words. They're very important for the pocketbooks of billions of people on this planet."

In an effort to support borrowing and spending, Federal Reserve policy-makers last week cut the benchmark interest rate on overnight loans between banks by a quarter of a percentage point. They meet again Nov. 19.

"Between now and next spring, I wouldn't be surprised to see three more cuts," said economist Sung Won Sohn of Norwest Corp. in Minneapolis.

Last week's Fed action came a month after the collapse of the Russian ruble, which triggered what Greenspan called a "quantum shift" in market sentiment marked by plunging stock prices and a worldwide flight from risky investments.

"It has been a fairly dramatic, broad and as yet seemingly incom-

U.S. gives Milosevic chance to avoid strike

By Misha Savic
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — A U.S. envoy gave Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic another chance yesterday to bow to international demands and avoid NATO airstrikes. But Milosevic remained defiant. Following his meeting with envoy Richard Holbrooke, Milosevic's office said "attempts were made to overcome the differences" over the crisis in Kosovo province.

Referring to the possibility of NATO airstrikes, the Yugoslav statement said "the threats which are delivered to our country jeopardize the continuation of the political process."

It accused foreign governments of waging "a media campaign against our country" through "one-sided and fabricated reports." U.S. officials refused comment on the talks, and Holbrooke left for Brussels, Belgium, to meet Secretary of State Madeleine Albright today.

Before the talks ended, President Clinton reiterated that Milosevic has to end his crackdown in Kosovo, pull out his special police force and resume negotiations. Kosovo is a province of Serbia, the main republic of Yugoslavia.

But 90 percent of its two million inhabitants are ethnic Albanians, and most favor independence or substantial self-rule. Milosevic launched his crackdown Feb. 28 against the ethnic Albanian Kosovo Liberation Army, which is fighting for independence for Kosovo. Hundreds have been killed and more than 270,000 people have been driven from their homes.

Despite mounting evidence of Milosevic's non-compliance and a U.N. declaration confirming it, Washington seemed to lack the international consensus needed to bomb Milosevic into compliance. The United States is trying to get Milosevic and the ethnic Albanians to agree on a deal that would defer for two or three years a decision on whether to separate Kosovo from Serbia.

"We are continuing to push for military action against the Serbs," State Department spokesman James Rubin said. "NATO is not there yet."

U.S. officials also face strong opposition from Russia, whose Defense Minister Igor Sergeyev warned yesterday the move could lead to even more bloodshed in Kosovo.

"This is not a penalty or punishment of an isolated country but almost a real war," Marshal Sergeyev said in Athens, Greece. Milosevic's repeated references to the "threats" undermining chances for peace appeared aimed at playing on those divisions, not only between the Russians and NATO but within the Western alliance itself.

"I do not believe the United States can be in a position, I do not believe NATO can be in a position, of letting tens of thousands of people starve or freeze to death this winter," Clinton said. In Brussels, NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana said "NATO will take a decision of their own." That implied the alliance would not insist on the U.N. approval some U.S. allies and Russia believe necessary.

Preparations for intervention continued in Yugoslavia and abroad.

Britain, France and Germany all recommended their citizens leave Yugoslavia. Canada has already evacuated all nonessential diplomatic staff and their families from its Belgrade embassy, and U.S. officials said dependents of its embassy employees would soon be evacuated.

In Belgrade the city government said it was making preparations for possible strikes. Warning sirens blared in some Serbian towns. Some opposition parties said mobilization of air defense reservists was underway.

Meanwhile, Milosevic tried to show that he was working to settle the Kosovo crisis by dispatching Serbian premier Mirko Marjanovic to the province and inviting the 54-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to the area.

China bans Starr report due to language, content

By Charles Hutzler
Associated Press

BEIJING — Like soft porn and subversive novels, China's press censors have banned Chinese-language versions of Kenneth Starr's report detailing President Clinton's affair with Monica Lewinsky.

Chinese officials disliked the report's salacious details and worried that its contents somehow would damage improving Chinese—U.S. relations, media and publishing sources said yesterday.

Because the sources work in enterprises strictly supervised by the government, they spoke on condition of anonymity.

The ban, however, is likely to have little effect. Pornographic videos and Penthouse magazine can be bought on many street corners. Although the private lives of Chinese leaders are off-limits to the media, interest is high. Underground copies of a banned book about the late Mao Tse-tung's dalliances still circulate. A popular Chinese Internet search engine, Sohoo, records several thousand hits a day at its Clinton scandal site.

One or two publishers supposedly printed the Starr report in Chinese and distributed their versions to local sellers, the sources said.

The Communist Party-run Propaganda Department, which has ultimate authority over the media, decided to issue the ban last week, and the government's Press and Publications Administration ordered book stores this week to take copies of the report off the shelves, the sources said.

In a rare display of openness, the state-run Beijing Morning Post reported the ban Tuesday, but company officials later refused to comment.

A Beijing city propaganda official, who identified himself as Mr. Zhang, said the Beijing Morning Post ran an unauthorized report and that no final decision had been made on the report.

Chance or Design

There are times in life when you are asked to make choices you don't like.

Your career shouldn't be one of those.

Working at CIGNA is different We don't try to force you into a job that doesn't fit your abilities. What we do is find rewarding, challenging and (yes) fun opportunities for tomorrow's business leaders. Ones that take the kind of talent and hard work you've already shown in earning your degree.

Y2K problem still a concern

By Chris Allbritton
Associated Press

NEW YORK — If you thought the Year 2000 computer bug was bad, just wait. Other problems that computers may have with dates and data could cost even more to fix and promise to extend well into the next century.

The much-fretted Y2K problem, which arises from the way computers keep track of dates using two digits instead of four, is expected to cost the world between $600 billion and $4.6 trillion to fix.

Less familiar looming concerns include:

- The European Union's conversion to the new euro currency starting in a few months;
- The rollover of the date system in Global Positioning System satellites;
- America's surfeit of telephones for home and office, voice and data, threatening the possibility that the nation could run out of phone numbers; and
- Ditto Social Security numbers, which are not used again when people die.

That's the warning of Capers Jones, chief scientist at Artemis Management Systems Inc. and founder of Software Productivity Research, which analyzes software development and planning. Starting next year, date and data corrections will dominate the software industry, said Jones, and the repairs will cost $5 trillion over the years 1999 to 2050. He predicted these problems, along with Y2K, will damage the software industry for a generation.

"The best we can hope for is a quick recovery," he said.

The European Monetary Union will begin its conversion to the euro currency Jan. 1, 1999, and union countries are scheduled to phase out national currencies in 2004.

The euro conversion is the second largest software challenge in the world behind the Y2K problem, said Jones, and it's more sophisticated. Instead of changing every date in a computer system with a single deadline looming, computer systems have to be able to handle the different ways the 11 union countries change over.

Further complicating the problem are individual companies that may convert completely to conducting business in euros, or they may continue to track their national currency while simultaneously using the euro.

No agreement to end standoff over Iraq

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Iraq and the United Nations failed to reach an agreement on resuming spot searches of suspected weapons sites after 10 days of talks, officials said yesterday.

Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz told reporters after his fourth and final meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan that he would take the U.N. proposals back to Baghdad for consultations.

"We are going to weigh the situation in its entirety in Baghdad," Aziz said. He planned to leave New York later yesterday. Neither side announced any breakthrough in the impasse that has prevented U.N. experts from searching for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq for over two months.

A statement issued by Annan's office said simply that "both sides agreed that the process of dialogue would continue." The talks were intended to persuade Iraq to end its refusal to cooperate with inspectors in return for a Security Council review of its efforts to disarm itself.

Such a review could force the 15-member council to acknowledge Baghdad's progress over seven years of intrusive inspections and build support for an easing of sanctions that have crippled Iraq's economy.

U.N. weapons experts must certify that Iraq has destroyed its biological, chemical and nuclear weapons — and the long-range missiles used to deliver them — before the council will lift sanctions imposed after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, touching off the Persian Gulf War.

Iraq announced Aug. 5 it was ending cooperation with the U.N. weapons teams because their chief, Richard Butler, refused to certify that Iraq had destroyed its banned weapons.

The move has ended spot inspections of suspected weapons sites because U.N. inspectors have been told by Tehran that they must be accompanied by Iraqis.

During four meetings with Aziz, Annan conveyed his ideas of how the Security Council's "comprehensive review" might be carried out.

But there are disagreements among council members, with the United States and Britain insisting the inspectors first be allowed to do their work unimpeded before any serious discussions begin on a comprehensive review.

Aziz said he had received assurances from British Ambassador Jeremy Greenstock, the council president, that there would be no "artificial delays" on starting the review. But he denounced the "unacceptable conditions" put forward by another council member, referring to the United States.

The failed talks came amid reports of "strong evidence" that a French laboratory had corroborated U.S. findings that some Iraqi missile warheads had traces of ingredients used to make the deadly VX nerve gas.

Diplomats here have suggested that France — which generally takes a sympathetic view toward Iraq — was withholding the results so as to not undermine the delicate negotiations between Annan and Aziz.

Responding to the claims in yesterday's New York Times, the French Foreign Ministry said it was not aware that French experts had found any traces of VX.

Also complicating talks was a major six-month report issued Monday by Butler that disagreed with the U.N. chief's proposal for ending the impasse.

Annan has proposed making the U.N. inspectors responsible for proving that Iraq still has weapons of mass destruction, as Iraq has long demanded.

Butler said adopting the proposal would reverse the burden of disclosure placed on Baghdad by the Security Council in its original resolutions.

Crazy Jesus people

To whatever campus event organizer invited the Crazy Jesus People to perform outside the Student Union building on Monday: Thank you. Nothing perks up my day like religious fanaticism. This was better than Midnight Madness or a spring concert or even that big Oscar-Meyer Weinermobile last week. Let me cast my vote for making this a weekly event. Are the Crazy Jesus People available to perform at birthday parties too?

It was like walking into an episode of Jerry Springer, except with nice weather. There was some trailer park refugee chick with a big sign that said something about being born again through Jesus. She told everybody who walked by that they were on their way to hell. Actually, I was on my way to French class, but why quibble? She caught me laughing at her and said, "You won't be laughing when you get there" (I assume she meant hell, not French class). I was really scared at first. Then I realized that most of my friends are pretty bad people. It wouldn't surprise me if they all went to hell. In fact, just about all of the really fun people in the world — rock stars, the guys who created South Park, George Carlin — are probably gonna end up in hell, too. So what's the big deal? Hell is starting to look like a rockin' place.

There was some other guy holding a big wooden cross. I really wanted to ask him if he'd made it himself but he didn't seem like a conversational guy. I think he was their leader because he did the most yelling. I couldn't understand a lot of what he was saying because he was a really smart guy and it went right over my head. But the general message seemed to be that we UMass students are all going to hell because we're paying for a college education instead of listening to Jesus. I can dig that. After all, nowhere in the Bible does it mention anything about Jesus attending college.

> "She told everybody who walked by that we were on our way to hell. Actually, I was on my way to French class, but why quibble?"
> Boomer Pinches

I especially appreciated the big banner that said "You Are All Going To Hell," in pretty colors. It was clear they had put a lot of time and thought into it, though if I may give them some advice for next time: When trying to persuade people to listen to what you have to say, it is generally not a good idea to start off by insulting them. It'd be like a TV commercial saying: "You're ugly. Drink Coke."

Then people started arguing with the Crazy Jesus Guy, but no matter what they said to him he just stuck by his main point: "You're all going to hell!" And you really can't argue with a comeback like that. It's like in grade school when no matter what someone said to you, you could just say, "I know you are but what am I?" Some of the people arguing with him were Christians but not Crazy Jesus People. I felt a little bad for them because most of the Christians I know are pretty cool and I'll bet the Crazy Jesus People give them a really bad image. I mean, Jesus came to earth to teach us how to love one another and we crucified the poor guy. And after all that, he actually forgave us. Now that's what I call a nice gesture. Me, I can't even forgive that guy in the white Volvo who cut me off on Route 9 the other day. Burn in hell, white Volvo.

Then the guy with the cross just got plain nasty. He made fun of some people's clothes, citing their taste in fashion as evidence that they were going to hell (he didn't make fun of mine so presumably K-Mart shoppers are in the clear). He pointed out this one girl and said she looked like a man in a woman's body (whoever you are, I didn't think you looked like a man). And I thought, "You know, Crazy Jesus People are pretty much the last people to go making fun. Not just cause they're nuts but because they were all pretty darn ugly, in that "my wife is also my sister and my daughter" kind of way. And no I don't feel bad accusing them of incest because they did tell me I was going to hell, after all, which is a pretty mean thing to say.

Finally the guy picked up his big cross and started walking away, hounded by people who were actually trying to reason with him, a Sisyphusian task if ever there was one. I really wanted to follow just in case more fun ensued, like a riot or a lynching. But I was late for French and I don't think "I wanted to see if the Crazy Jesus Nut would be crucified" counts as a valid excuse for missing class.

All about the Benzies

The way I see it the fact that Marcus Camby left UMass one year early cost me somewhere in the vicinity of $4 million. At first this may seem like an absurd statement, but once I have presented my case I'm sure that all of you will undoubtedly believe me.

Let us go back a few years right now. It was the 1995-96 basketball season. The Minutemen were one of the marquee teams in the nation, John Calipari was roaming the sidelines, Camby was controlling the court, I was a senior at Agawam High School and you could drink a beer on this campus without being sent to the guillotine.

> "You have to understand that for my plan to succeed Marcus would have to become extremely agitated and beat me to a pulp."
> Dan Viens

The basketball team only had two losses that season. One of these was a Final Four loss to the eventual national champion Kentucky Wildcats. Mr. Camby had a great season and was the college basketball player of the year. After the season it became apparent that Camby would be a high draft pick so he decided to come out early.

Everyone saw it one of two ways. They either said, "Hey, good for Marcus. He's gonna have a great career." Or they said," Oh man, he should stay in school and try to win a national championship!"

No one even cared about how this decision affected me. Well let me tell you. I got shafted — big time!

You see my freshman year at this school should have been Camby's senior year. Therefore it is a given that we would have resided on the same campus. Even better, during second semester I moved to John Adams. For those of you who don't know, JA is only a few feet from John Quincy Adams, which is where Camby would have lived. Seeing as we would have lived so close to each other it can be assumed that our paths would have crossed on a number of occasions.

This is where my plan starts taking shape.

Now even if Camby had come back and the team was a national force, it is probable that they would have lost at least one game. This is where I would have pounced.

Before I continue let me write myself a little disclaimer. I am a big fan of Marcus Camby. I thoroughly enjoyed watching him and the Minutemen get to the Elite Eight and Final Four. I have a great amount of respect for his basketball game and I wish him the best of luck during the rest of professional career. OK, now I will continue.

As soon as I saw Marcus after the team lost, knowing that he could easily beat the crap out of me, I would have really let him have it. I would have said stuff like," Hey Camby, what happened last night. You couldn't have hit water if you fell out of a boat."

I would have called him an overrated stiff. I'd have said."Way to go Marcus, you're going to have a great pro career." I would have shouted every basketball insult that I have ever heard. You have to understand that for my plan to succeed Marcus would have to become extremely agitated and beat me to a pulp.

I am indeed a skilled agitator. I'm sure that I could get Marcus to a boiling point, but the hard part would be to not let him get away from me. After all, he is pretty quick. However, I would have known that my future hung in the balance and I would have remained persistent. I would have followed him around campus like a UMass student following a full keg around a frat house.

Finally after following and antagonizing him for who knows how long, he would have snapped. Marcus would have taken all he could take. His eyes would become bloodshot and veins would be popping out everywhere. If all of this happened then he would surely attack me. He would have fallen right into my trap.

Seeing as Camby is 6-foot-11 and weighs over 200 pounds and I am about 5-foot-7 and 145 pounds he would have easily knocked me out. I would, of course, allow him to do so. I wouldn't allow him to do this. I wouldn't allow him to kill me; I would simply allow him to maim me. I know that this is a little weird, but how else could I get my piece of the pie?

After spending what would hopefully be a substantial amount of time in the hospital I would assemble a powerful legal team. If all went as planned, Marcus would be acquitted of any criminal charges. After all he wouldn't have been making much money if he was behind bars. The next step would be to file civil charges.

Hopefully the trial would at least go into his rookie year so that I would be able to collect on his professional earnings. Finally, I would be able to cash in on taking the beating of a lifetime from Marcus Camby.

Everyone whines and cries that UMass should have had a great team that year. If not that, then they are complaining that Marcus hasn't had as productive a pro career as he should have.

What I want to know is why isn't anyone crying for me? Why isn't anyone crying for me when I take the PVTA to Northampton instead of driving in my new Mercedes? Why isn't anyone worried that I might twist an ankle skateboarding to Totman pool at 7 a.m. to make $40 a week instead of living off my $4 million nest egg?

I lost my chance at riches and I only hope that by reading this column you have learned to always strive for your goals.

Hmm, I wonder if Lari Ketner will go pro.

Busta Move

Ten years ago I was imagining what it would be like to rollerskate with Fred Savage during "couples skate": I imagined skating over Winnie Cooper's face as we rolled away into the sunset.

My grandmother asked me on the phone the other day "where do you see yourself in ten years?"

"Well Bubbie," I said "hopefully in ten years I'll be off the crack and my pimp, Kobra, won't be hassling me no more about the money I owe him. If he does, I'll have to drag his ass back to Jerry Springer — I hope that's still on in ten years..."

Bubbie didn't laugh.

Honestly, ten years seems like such a far leap into the future, that I can't even postulate what my life will be like then. But, ten years ago I was twelve and in the sixth grade — that wasn't so long ago...

I wore stretch stonewashed jeans and a B.U.M. sweatshirt. I had a perm that little old ladies thought was unhip. My aunt from Long Island made me tie-dyed, rhinestoned glittery legging-outfits and assured me I'd start a trend at my school. People just checked their do's in the mirrors on my shirt and laughed.

I learned a lot in the sixth grade. All the words to Debbie Gibson's Out of the Blue album and what the proper response was when someone told me to "get a life" ("I have one. Where did you get yours, at the K-Mart blue-light special?"). Damn, I was saucy.

I cursed at my parents for the first time when they told me they'd be chaperoning my middle school Halloween dance. My dad, who taught in the same school, came dressed as Dracula, my mom came as an overprotective, photo-taking embarrassment. I told them this was definitely not "rad."

My mother told me all the boys who called me "big but" and said I had bugs in my hair, really had crushes on me. According to my mom's definition of love, I was definitely a vixen, like Samantha Fox ("Naughty girls need love too," I suppose).

It seems like only yesterday I was doing the running man and Roger Rabbit to Technotronic. I was very, very cool — in a nerdy, uncomfortable, insecure kind of way.

I still have constant, remnants of my twelve year old life around me. I still know the words to "Busta Move" by Young M.C. If I was thrown into the wilderness, by myself with no means of survival — I could make a compass out of twigs and yarn like they taught us in Girl Scout camp. More importantly, I am able to tight roll my jeans in any sort of crisis.

> "If I was thrown into the wilderness, I could make a compass out of twigs and yarn like they taught us in girl scout camp. More importantly, I am able to tight roll my jeans in any sort of crisis."
> Julie Fialkow

Ah, fast forward to today and Fred Savage is no longer calling his brother "butthead" or lusting after that stuck-up hooch Winnie Cooper. He's donning a suit, and starring in a sitcom called "Working." Oh God — Kevin Arnold is working.

Where do I want to be in ten years? I'm not sure, I hope I have a dog that waits for me to come home everyday. That I can afford to rent a house at the Jersey shore with friends, and drink good beer. But not enough money to buy a fancy car or eat gourmet cheese.

In ten years I'll be almost thirty-two and hopefully will have learned how to set my VCR and balance a checkbook. Maybe I won't have to call my mom and ask her how to boil eggs, or hem a skirt. Hell, I hope I have to call, and not walk down the hall to ask her.

It'd be swell to have someone to share the Sunday paper and watch Home Shopping Network with (call me a romantic fool). Maybe Fred Savage will be out of work and come find that girl who sent him a birthday card when he turned thirteen. Dearest Bubbie, me and Fred will be just fine, just send cash, cause I still don't have a job.

Letters to the Editor

Religious group insulted students

To the editor:

This letter is in regards to a speech that was given at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst on Monday, Oct. 5, 1998.

A woman and two children were giving out pamphlets and holding banners that said "Repent," while a man holing a wooden cross yelled out to passersby that we were wasting our time getting an education, and were all going to hell. The pamphlet, distributed by a boy about seven-years-old, was entitled "College — Preparing You for a Future in Hell!"

This pamphlet says, "The pagan chants his work-ethic mantra: 'I am going to help make this world a better place.' As if such stupidity is supposed to be admired." It is my understanding that they believe, as the pamphlet states, "God is about to destroy this world! He is going to create a new heaven and a new earth."

With this in mind, since the "world is ending," wouldn't it make more sense to try to help clothe and feed those who are without while we are here, instead of coming into our community and telling us that we are sinners and wasting our time getting an education? Will ignorance secure a place for these people in heaven?

The people who came to UMass managed to insult every member of our community. First of all, simply for wanting to enrich our minds, we are labeled "sinners." The pamphlet insults everyone who does not hold the same beliefs.

Women and homosexuals are degraded. "The demon Jezebel dispenses witchcraft in its 20th century guise of 'women's rights.'" Homosexuals are referred to as "demons" and students, professors and anyone trying to better themselves are called followers of Satan.

Since they believe that "every educational, political, social and religious system of this world is saturating your mind with demonic attitudes of self-pride," then what exactly are they proposing? That we all remain ignorant to the world around us? Since the only absolute certainty that we, as humans, have is that we are all on this earth together, how can we not make the best of what we have here.

Hopefully, in the future, they will have the decency to not come uninvited to communities and insult their every member.

Her control and confidence make Liz one Phair femme

LIZ PHAIR
Avalon Ballroom
Oct. 6

BOSTON — The kid behind me at the Liz Phair show on Tuesday night asked me at one point: "How is she?" referring to her performance.

Do I have to tell you?

I thought it was obvious. It wasn't hard to see through the lack of pyrotechnics or smoke bombs or intricate light shows to see that Liz Phair put on an incredible performance. She left her infamous stage fright in Guyville, and took command of the Avalon audience. Wearing a fetching red silk shirt and dress, bathed in green light, she displayed a confidence you didn't think was possible from this self- proclaimed scaredy-cat. That and for the first few songs you could have sworn she was a young Stevie Nicks, with her command of the stage and a slight warble in her voice. By the time she walked out solo to begin the encore with a touching version of "Perfect World," you knew she was in control.

Oh, and she was in control — confident, self-assured and, most of all, sexy. She was the girl at the bar, cigarette in one hand, daring people to talk to her, to not lay a line on her. She was saying Je m'appelle Liz. Je suis super sexy. Welcoming catcalls from the audience, she showed them how they should be done at one point. It was pure Liz Phair, deriving power from turning the tables.

The live setting only heightened the realization that Liz Phair is one of the most confident, intelligent songwriters around today. This stretches back to her earliest work, of which she played a lot. In fact, she played more songs off of her first album, Exile in Guyville than she did off of her latest, the amazing and surprising whitechocolatespaceegg. While in the past the brutal honesty of the songs and her "potty mouth" overshadowed just how well she can write, but these days her honest lyrics and song structures took center stage. The whole concert was a veritable Liz Phair pop quiz, with 19 songs in all, drawing off of all three of her full-length albums.

Of course, this then means she did not shy away from the frank sexuality that made her famous. She actually framed certain songs off of her older albums in such a way as to attention to them. "Flower," perhaps the dirtiest lullaby ever, was sung by Phair with only her guitarist to accompany her. With a blue light on, she sang every word dripping in reverb, while the audience sung along fervently. She got a huge round of applause for this, and bowed deeply (at the waist, of course). And "Dance of the Seven Veils" was also performed stripped down, adding to the sense that Phair walks unafraid these days.

The high point came early, with "Johnny Feelgood," a song that didn't grab me on record, but was surprisingly great live. With a huge drum beat behind it, the song took on a new, vibrant life. Equally great was "Supernova," off of Whip-smart. While it's great on record, it translated well to the live setting, with the phased out guitar, and a thundering bass line that anchored the song. And anytime you have a whistling solo, as there was (twice) in "Support System," you know things are going well.

Not doing so well live was "What Makes You Happy," a fantastic swirling, techno-flavored song off of

Harmon has finally found "Order"

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Say hello to the latest "L & O" newbie. She's Angie Harmon, who joins "Law & Order" in the role of Assistant District Attorney Abbie Carmichael as the crime drama notches its ninth season.

And eighth cast change.

The series' key positions (three at the precinct house investigating each week's crime, three at the courthouse prosecuting the suspect) have thus far been filled with no fewer than 14 actors.

Meanwhile, "Law & Order," the longest-running drama on TV and arguably the best, maintains rock-solid consistency in its scripts, production values and evolving ensemble — somehow, each change further crystallizes the show's unerring vision.

This tradition should continue, based on early sightings of Harmon. Sure, "Law & Order" fans will miss Jamie Ross, the straight-arrow, statuesque "second chair" played by Harmon's predecessor Carey Lowell (who took her leave two years after replacing Jill Hennessy, who three years before that had replaced Richard Brooks from the show's originally all-male cast).

But Abbie, a fiercely independent Texan who cut her teeth prosecuting drug dealers, seems likely to stir things up in the DA's office — and on the show. ("Law & Order" airs tonight on NBC at 10 p.m. EDT.)

Harmon, a former model who speaks with a smoky twang that evokes her native Dallas, learned that she had landed the role on a Wednesday in July. Next day she was dispatched to New York, where that Friday she took part in a "table read" of the season's first script. Then she flew back to Los Angeles for a network publicity event. Then back to New York that Sunday night.

Then, first thing Monday at Manhattan's Chelsea Piers Studios, she claimed her place alongside co-stars Steven Hill, Sam Waterston, S. Epatha Merkerson, Jerry Orbach and Benjamin Bratt as the cameras rolled.

"I think I'm kinda settled now," she says during a recent interview. "I was a little intimidated on the show at first, but now I'm getting my boots on, getting down and dirty with my character and everybody else."

As she speaks, Harmon has polished off five episodes, as well as a to-die-for apple tart here at Bergdorf Goodman's fifth-floor cafe. Aglow from lunch following her brief shooting day, and with money to spend in Bergdorf's that afternoon, she seems pleased with her life.

It's a welcome recovery from her roller coaster ride the past 12 months. Last fall she was a regular on ABC's new drama "C-16." She played Amanda Reardon, a rookie in the FBI's elite C-16 crime unit.

"I was so close to the character," she says wistfully. "Amanda wanted to prove herself to the other members of her group, and so did I, as an actress, to the rest of the cast. It was so parallel."

Including the parallel lack of experience. Conveniently, Harmon's character was supposed to appear unsure of herself. For Harmon, new to series television, portraying that was a snap.

"I could walk out on the set after they called 'action,' and slip and fall and throw papers all over the place and sneeze, and it would totally work. They'd say, 'Yes! She's brilliant!'"

But just before Christmas, Harmon, with the rest of the "C-16" company, found out her show had been canceled.

"It was such a crushing blow," she says. "I'm one of those people who likes to believe that when a door closes, a window opens. But when we got the news, I was thinking, 'Where's my window so I can jump out of it?'"

Months later, still with no prospects, she beat a temporary retreat from L.A., driving up the California coast.

"When I got home, my electricity was shut off. My phone was shut off. So I'm trying to go around paying my bills and in the middle of all that, do an audition."

She means one of her umpteen auditions for Abbie, a character who radiates strength and self-confidence — traits that were dramatically out of sync with Harmon's state of mind.

"Then, when I came out of the audition," she recalls, "I get in my car and the window explodes."

The glass in the driver's-side door of her BMW inexplicably had shattered.

"I'm waiting for my head to go like this," and she mimics a severed head toppling off her shoulders.

"I had tiny points of blood all over my arms and face, and when I went to pay another bill, the woman said, 'Are you all right?' I said, 'Don't shut off my gas! OK?'"

And they didn't. Angie Harmon won her case. Soon after that, she won her role.

Love marks Tribe's comeback

By David Katzoff
Collegian Correspondent

THE LOVE MOVEMENT
A Tribe Called Quest
Jive

Catching word of Tribe's break-up hit me hard. Their first three albums, People's Instinctive Travels and the Paths of Rhythm, Low End Theory, and Midnight Marauders (all bonafide classics) have been musical safe-havens for me when I needed them. Even Beats Rhymes and Life provided enough inspiration and zest to rock necks from a house party to a thought session. So listening to their fifth and final effort was a lump throat experience.

The album begins with "Start it Up," a jazzy, up-tempo beat accompanied by Q-Tip's staccato lyrics to match. Even though this song is a nice jump start, the overall flow of the album sometimes stalls. "Find a Way" and "The Love" are enjoyable and even the catchy but annoying N.O.R.E., spewing the anti-tribe message of "...all we really care about is money, cheeba, and sex" on "Give Me" does not ruin the mood of this enjoyable, light-hearted anthem.

However Tribe seems to lose focus on songs like "Common Ground (Get it Goin' On)," "Da Booty," and "Like it Like That" where, for the first time ever, it feels like they needed filler tracks to lengthen their album. While each of these songs are not excruciating by any means, it seems that Tip and Phife's carefree flow becomes careless at times.

The outstanding thing about this nine year relationship is that A Tribe Called Quest has always stuck to the mentality of spreading positivity via bumpin', sample crazed beats and lyrically innovative messages. This creativity accounts for their broad-based following. When hip-hop was stale, Tribe were bakers of the freshest material, and their albums could be played without skipping a track. Although The Love Movement is a stellar piece of

Blues magic of Son House revisited on Legacy's Original Delta Blues

His recording career began in 1930 with a couple of 78's from Paramount. He didn't record again until 1942, and he then disappeared for two decades until the blues revival of the 1960's. He counts Robert Johnson, Muddy Waters, and Howlin' Wolf among his followers. He is Son House.

This summer Legacy has revived Son House once again, re-releasing The Original Delta Blues as part of their Mojo Workin' blues series.

This disk gets to the absolute root of the blues, with no electricity, no horn section, and no overblown backup singers. Son House, with or without his steel guitar, is able to lead the listener down a dusty dirt road, out over the countryside to stare right in the face of the blues, smiling and saying, "Here you go. This is my gift to you."

It has been said that Son House and Charley Patton single handedly created the blues vernacular, and by the first track on this CD, "Death Letter," no one would doubt it. Twanging and sliding his strings with a driving rhythm, House runs down the full list of blues themes, mumbling and groaning about traveling, unrequited love, judgement day, and starting it all off with the classic intro "Got up This Morning."

The more deliberate, "Louise McGhee," sounds off "it's a shame, it's a shame, that I ever knowed Louise's name," then delves into the traveling theme again still twanging away on the steel body. The influence House had on Muddy Waters is apparent on this one, with its call and response similar to that in "Hoochie Coochie Man" and "Mannish Boy."

"John The Revelator" shows that Son House needs no instrumental backing to help him convey emotion. With many biblical references and a little bit of clapping at the chorus, House preaches this one alone and proud.

The real heart of the recording seems to begin with "Grinnin' In Your Face," a defiant song, again with no music other than Son House's voice and clapping. It speaks of the quest for true friendship and shows courage in the face of oppression.

"Levee Camp Moan" follows with the first sound of a harmonica on the album, and it revels in the spirit of the slaves' work songs. This track is unbelievable, wavering and dipping, then ascending again as the harmonica and guitar seem to speak.

"Downhearted Blues" closes the CD ironically with the line, "Got up this morning feeling sick and bad, thinkin' bout the good times, I once had had."

The rhythms on every track are often very complicated, stopping and coming, calming and exciting, unlike anything that is being released these days. The music is irregular and unable to be contained.

The steel slide guitar captures the country sound, but it is House himself who tells the story of the rural South of the twentieth century, describing all aspects of life from the church to the train station to the levee camp. His vocals show a strain, speaking of a striving, a yearning to be free.

It is one of the most beautiful recordings anyone could ever lay their ears on.

Antz brings us the bugs' life

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Correspondent

ANTZ
Directed by Eric Darnell with the voices of Woody Allen, Sharon Stone, Sylvester Stallone
Playing at Hompshire Six Theaters

From the very first scene, Antz captivates the audience with its small, fanciful world. The underground ant realm has a magical quality to it, yet is assimilated remarkably well to the real world. Thereby, we gain a unique perspective into the lives of the ants. We can understand them; we are familiar with their problems, their frustrations, and their dreams. The movie's ability to create a realistic and fascinating microcosm of our own society is just one of the many pleasures of Antz.

The plot revolves around Z, a disillusioned worker ant, and his quest for the forbidden princess Bala. One day, he switches places with his best friend Weaver, a soldier ant, just to see her. Needless to say, chaos ensues. After surviving a deadly battle and a botched kidnapping attempt, Z takes Bala in search of the elusive "Insectopia", where no insect works and the streets are lined with food.

Unfortunately, this trip to paradise is interrupted by the need to return home and save the colony from an evil menace.

The writing for Antz was surprisingly sharp and witty. The Weitz brothers did not simply create Z and then cast Woody Allen for the part; they wrote Z to be Woody Allen. Thereby, they allow Allen's neurotic, paranoid, and frustrated mannerisms to be played out in Z. This tactic not only proves to be enormously funny but also provides a lot of charm throughout the movie. In addition, most of the dialogue is clever, amusing and refreshing despite the occasional pithy joke or bug pun. It's not often that animated films provide any noteworthy lines, never mind the engaging pseudo-intellectual banter found in Antz.

Visually, Antz is as well crafted as the rest of the movie. The Dreamworks' animation clearly and artistically defines thousands of ants and provides rich, streamlined settings that stay true to the ants' perspective. To the audience, the outside world is apparently banal and unoriginal, but for the ants, it is a mythical, dazzling place with streams of cola and an endless abundance of goodies. This scene is contrasted with the strikingly sleek, urbanized, structured colony in which the ants live. Although familiar to the ants, we are fascinated by this world, their social system, their use of modern devices, and the intricate infrastructure of the colony. The surrealistic enchanting quality of the settings serves to further enhance the sheer affability of Antz. This is the ants' movie; we delight in their magical world and perhaps living vicariously through them in this world.

Plus, it's fun to see some of Hollywood's biggest stars as animated ants. Aside from the overly generous representation of Woody Allen, Sylvester Stallone assumes his typical buff Rambo appearance as Weaver. Gene Hackman is particularly priceless as the evil general, Mandible. And if the animation serves no other purpose, it finally makes Woody Allen believable as a romantic lead, which is nothing short of miraculous.

I could have done without the whole Macchiavelli-Hitler–wannabe general and social change aspect of the plot, but they probably needed some action to entertain the kids. Thankfully, the movie is generally romantic comedy and largely character-driven. When the characters are both interesting and amusing, this is a good sign. Allen shines in this roll even if, as a hall mate is quick to remind me, all worker ants are sterile females in real life. Hey, we are dealing with animation here, not a documentary. Fortunately, this is a fresh, imaginative, and humorous animated film that breaks some new ground by appealing more to adults than to kids. B the new album. Live, the musicians tried to make up for the lack of studio savvy, but they just overcompensated. The chorus didn't lift off like it does on the album. But it was the only misstep of the night, and it may have been saved by the huge response the line "And all those other bastards were only practice" received.

The night welcomed sing-along and shout-outs. "I wanna be cool, tall, vulnerable and luscious," from "Perfect World" had everyone singing along. Hey, who doesn't want to be cool, tall, vulnerable and luscious? And that's part of the charm of Phair's music. While she sticks out her chin and chain smokes by the bar, there are fissures of insecurity underneath her facade that everyone can identify with. The night ended with a high-powered version of Guyville's "Fuck and Run." Everyone, men and women, were seen singing along "I want a boyfriend." It was one of those moments where gender was erased and Liz Phair took in the moment, waving off her guitar tech after her guitar fell off, happily dancing along with the band.

With the confidence displayed at the Avalon, one has to wonder where the stage fright comes from. She was cool, tall, vulnerable and luscious.

work, it is hard not to ignore a few songs. It's finest moments come on Phife's solo track "His Name is Mutty Ranks," which is a booming assault with a melodic, but rough-cut dancehall chorus. The problem is that it is only two minutes long and we are left salivating for subsequent verses. "Steppin' It Up" is for the hard-core heads with its vigorous bassline and raw rhythm that gets your head nodding steadier than when your mom asked you if your room was clean. Busta Rhymes (who takes a short commercial break) and Redman also co-star to give it extra kick. Another satisfying track is the more underground, "Rock Rock Y'all" featuring Lyricist Lounge sensations Mos Def, Punchline and Wordsworth. This song has a distinct guitar loop which is a funk-induced rarity for an Ummah production but somehow fits almost as well as anything. If you can ignore Jane Doe and try not to notice that Phife is absent than this may be the most underrated song on the LP.

On the whole, The Love Movement is a pleasurable change from the hip-hop norm... that, at times, does beat you in the head with its love theme. But like many ATCQ albums, listening is like an itch you can't help scratching. Even with its weaker moments it provides our ears with unique quality that is hard to come by these days.

After the last song ticks away it is hard to digest that Tribe's decade of excellence has drawn to a close. And as I sit immersed in thoughts and memories, I am tempted to play the album again, which reminds me how fortunate I am to have taken part in sharing the distinct charisma of A Tribe Called Quest's music. Despite my criticism, there's no doubt that The Love Movement will spend heavy rotations in the stereo. B+

THANKS FOR READING THE COLLEGIAN, NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY

Why Roseanne will fail with her daytime talk show effort

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

Why, oh why, did they give Roseanne a talk show? Once again, it's another bad decision by networks to try to get ratings based on positive results that happened in the past. However, as many failed television attempts will tell you, the past is almost never a good indication of what will happen in the future. And after watching Roseanne's talk show, it looks like, for her, the future's not all that bright.

First of all, let's get something straight — the only thing that Roseanne and Rosie O'Donnell have in common is the first three letters of their first name. Roseanne may have had one of the most successful sitcoms in TV history, but she just does not have what it takes to make it in the talk show world. Hosting a talk show is undoubtedly a difficult job. Not only does it combine the ability to act with the ability to improvise, but it takes a lot out of a person. The most successful new TV talk show (and I'm not counting "Jerry Springer" because that's not a legitimate talk show) would have to be "The Rosie O'Donnell Show." It's the only talk show in recorded history that had the ability to gain a substantial audience of children ages 10-16. That's something that Roseanne will never be able to brag about, the fact that children watch her show, and that it's socially acceptable for them to do it. Even the queen of all talk shows, Oprah Winfrey, could not get kids to tune in. Rosie has achieved a great accomplishment and it has bolted her straight to the top of the celebrity chart of respect. She is one of the few people on television that, no matter when you turn on her show, you can fully understand what she is saying and doing; you know that she has done her homework and prepared for her show thoroughly.

If Rosie's got such a good thing going for her, then Oprah Winfrey has a great thing going for her. Rosie will never deny who the leader of the talk world is, and the two women have nothing but respect for each other. They more than acknowledge that the other is a great influence in the world of showbiz, and that they are both great successes. The success found in this business leads to bigger and better things in Hollywood. Oprah has the starring spot in the upcoming film Beloved — in a role that I feel could win her a Best Actress award at this year's Oscars. All the success has not come easy, and is the result of years of hard work.

After the wide success of Jerry Springer's show, and the death of a man that was a result of an incident on Jenny Jones' talk show, Oprah decided to get rid of all of the filth that she used to bring into her studio, and only invite guests that will stimulate interesting conversation, and will be seen as quality choices in the eyes of viewers. Consequently, Rosie O'Donnell has never intended to go the way of Jerry Springer, and it has done her wonders to stick to family oriented entertainment. These two women have clearly found the secret to gaining an audience. They have the talent and brains to design something that caught on easily, and have earned the rights to call themselves successes.

Unfortunately, success is rare in the talk show business. Maybe before taking this job, Roseanne should have made a phone call to Chevy Chase or Arsenio Hall. She could have watched one episode of Howie Mandel's talk show, which is dying fast, or maybe she could have been the second viewer to watch "The Magic Hour." (The only other viewer was Magic himself, and I'm pretty sure that half-way through, even he lost interest). It's much too often that a talk show does not last on the air, and there are simple reasons to understand why. The three main ingredients to create a quality talk show — that all of the lasting shows have had — are brains, commitment, and longevity.

The biggest mistake a producer can make is hiring a host that is not intelligent. Sure, Magic Johnson is arguably one of the greatest basketball players ever. He looked good in front of the camera, but bottom line was that if the topic didn't involve an orange spherical object that was being shot into a hoop, Magic was clueless, and consequently his talk show was more worthless than a TAU.

The next quality is that the host has to be committed to his or her show. Dennis Miller will tell you that the reason that he did not last long on network television is because he became uninterested in what he was doing.

The guests that were scheduled for him were not interesting, and he really didn't care about some of the people that were scheduled to be on the show. He didn't want to go to work every day, and that was the main reason why he was beaten into the ground when he was given a show on the networks. Not surprisingly, when Miller was offered a job at HBO to host a show that was only done once a week, and pretty much guaranteed that any guest that he wanted would be booked for the show, Miller jumped at the chance. He felt much more comfortable in a situation like this, and his show has become a huge success.

The final ingredient is longevity. You simply need to outlast all of the hype that surrounds the show whether it be good or bad, and go out there every day and do your job. That's how Oprah and Rosie got so good at what they do. They were able to ignore all the stuff that was being said outside of the studio, and keep at their work until it was perfect. This is a big step that most talk show hosts cannot get over. Even Jerry Springer constantly has to battle the media, but he has taken an exception to the rule, and made it so that his show actually thrives on the outside attention. No matter how you do it, you have to outlive your competitors, and that is the key to staying around in the talk show business.

So does Roseanne have what it takes? In my opinion, she does not. In the past, she has not been able to keep her private life out of her work, and she has not been able to stay focused on one thing at a time. She's been married so many times I've lost count, and when she was really famous, she could not help but eat up as much publicity as possible. She may be smarter than a lot of other talk show hosts, but the ideas that she comes up with are pretty much the same. The parts of her show that are staged seem to be easy to pick out, and her acting is extremely poor.

It just seems like her ability to gain an audience with a sitcom will not carry over to daytime talk — facts that all add up to Roseanne as a failure.

"Ally," "Felicity" highlight return to female viewpoints

Brooke Steinberg

"At age 15, I thought I'd have a love life; I don't even have a like life." — Claire Danes, "My So-Called Life"

And with those words, I remember feeling very excited, like I had just found a new friend who truly understood me. Just ten minutes into the series premiere, "My So-Called Life" could have been the title for a show about my life. The similarities between the protagonist, Angela Chase, and me were uncanny. Both of us were sophomores in high school and were battling and analyzing to death the faces we passed in the hallway, and those that stared back at us at the dinner table.

"My So-Called Life" was the first show that made it okay for teenage girls to have problems; especially ones that weren't solved in an hour, and forgotten about by the next week. It was unique because it revolutionized the portrayal of teenagers, especially girls, in a serious and realistic manner. Unfortunately, due to low ratings, the show was cancelled in the midst of only its first season. I cried when I heard about it. I wrote letters to ABC and urged my friends to do the same, begging them to put the show back on the air. But no such luck. It was until a year or two later when MTV, understanding how pertinent the program was to today's teens, ran the show in reruns.

Up until "My So-Called Life", the other show that I ignored the ringing of the telephone for was "Beverly Hills, 90210". This show was also about teens in high school, but Aaron Spelling style. In other words, beautiful people driving expensive cars, living in big houses, mixed in with the token episodes about race, sex, drugs, and alcohol. While I admit to being emotionally attached to these characters, I could never relate to them on a personal level. As time went on, I began to view "90210" as a farce. How many times would Steve, Brandon and Dylan refer to each other as "bro"? And wasn't Donna's hair two shades darker then in the previous scene? Could Val's shirt be cut any lower?

So what about a character I could relate to? As a television viewer, I have often felt it was "selfish" to want a show about a girl like me. Someone who didn't have it all, but was trying to figure out how she could. Ever since "My So-Called Life" went off the air, I looked to find a show and character who fit that mold, and came up empty every time.

It wasn't until last year that two female protagonists came on the scene that I felt were realistic. Maybe some things were a little far fetched. But what else could you expected from a medium that's purpose is to entertain and keep us tuned in every week?

Like "My So-Called Life", I feel in love with "Dawson's Creek" from the first episode. I immediately found myself rooting for Joey, the smart talking tomboy, instead of Jen, the all American blonde. Pretty in a nontraditional television way, Joey's tough home life was only more complicated by her crush on Dawson, her best friend. I was quite glad that Joey became the true star of the show, at times eclipsing Dawson. She is seen as smart, attractive and yet still struggling with the death of her mother, her low income lifestyle, and relating to the others at school.

For the more mature set, "Ally McBeal" took last year's television by storm. The strong female protagonist is a lawyer who works at a less than typical firm in Boston. While she experiences heartache and pain like a lot of other dramas out there, this show is different from the rest of the crowd because we get a look into Ally's true thoughts and dreams about what should would like to do or say to people. This show, according to Emmy standards, is considered a comedy, but it's serious and semi-realistic image and issues that face a female in a professional and personal setting separate her character and from all others out there on television today.

Perhaps it is too premature to count the new WB show "Felicity" among these shows, but from what I've seen of it, it seems to contain the formula that makes the others work. Felicity is no "Goody Two Shoes." She struggles, she cries, she's being faced with new challenges. As a college sophomore, I can look back and remember all of the emotions conjured up during my freshman year, and "Felicity" has touched upon many of them already. This isn't the first show about a girl living away from home for the first time – it is revolutionary in the realistic manner and problems surrounding a first year female college student.

Whenever I catch an old episode of "My So-Called Life" running on MTV, I always drop what I'm doing and watch. I always think how much I miss the show, and if there will ever be a show out there that will touch my life and its fans like it did. With what looks like a recent trend of strong, realistic female protagonists, it looks promising.

the entire game before falling 17-15.

The Rams' win in game three pushed the Minutewomen's backs to the wall in game four. The Minutewomen came out a bit tight, because the Rams were able to jump all over them, and open up a 13-4 lead. UMass would trade the remainder of the points and eventually fall, 15-7.

The big hitters for UMass were able to hit the ball for more kills then the big hitters for URI, but the Rams hit the big shots when they needed them.

Co-captain Jill Meyers tallied a match high 22 kills, while teammate Kari Hogancamp nailed down 20 kills of her own.

Rhode Island didn't have a problem with its own hitting, as Angela McHenry recorded 20 kills in the winning effort.

ter around arrangements made by assistant coach Scooter McCray in 1996 to keep player Nate Johnson's father from being evicted from a Louisville hotel by using his personal credit card to guarantee payment. The university disputed the NCAA's finding that McCray had tried to negotiate a discounted rate for the player's father.

The NCAA Division I Committee on Infractions announced its penalties last month for the nine violations involving rules governing extra benefits, recruiting, financial aid, institutional control and ethical conduct.

When the NCAA announced its report, Shumaker said: "The sanctions are fair, and I respect their conclusions."

The allegations came to light early last year and the NCAA in April issued a formal letter of inquiry into the two programs. The letter labeled the alleged violations as major, including a charge of 'years in prison.

DeBartolo was charged in connection with his efforts to win a license in 1997 for a floating casino along the Red River in the Shreveport area.

the NFL's top-rated pass defense. At least Brisby's opportunities have been increasing. In his first three seasons he had 45, 58 and 66 receptions.

But in 1996, a hamstring injury limited him to three games and no catches, although he did make two receptions in the Super Bowl. And last year, his first under coach Pete Carroll, he played all 16 games but had only 25 receptions and two touchdowns. He already has two touchdowns among his five catches in just four games this year.

"Maybe he wasn't used the last few years," Jefferson said, "but he's always been a good player."

Kansas City coach Marty Schottenheimer reached that conclusion a few years ago after Brisby caught three passes for 48 yards and a touchdown in a 31-26 Chiefs win.

"Everybody knows about Terry and, of course, Shawn is good," Schottenheimer said. "But I've always been a big fan of Brisby. I know he went through kind of a rough spell there [but] he lit it up against us here in Arrowhead [Stadium] a couple of years ago." That was in 1995 when Brisby led all Patriots wide receivers with 66 receptions. Only one other had more than 14. But this season Bledsoe has plenty of reliable targets. Glenn has 16 catches and two touchdowns.

Kinky Marv looks to get off tomorrow

ARLINGTON, Va. (AP) — More than a year after Marv Albert pleaded guilty to assault and battery in connection with a sexual encounter that turned ugly, his case goes back tomorrow before a judge who will probably dismiss it.

The sportscaster admitted in September 1997 to biting his former lover on the back in an Arlington hotel room. He denied allegations that he forced her to perform oral sex. In return for the plea, prosecutors dropped a felony sexual assault charge.

Prosecutors wanted Arlington Circuit Court Judge Benjamin N.A. Kendrick to impose a jail sentence for the misdemeanor, but he refused and said the conviction would be dismissed if Albert received counseling and stayed out of trouble for a year.

■ Indians

starting pitcher Dwight Gooden being ejected in the first inning, they bounced back to win Game 2 at Jacobs Field.

Even after the home split, few gave them a chance of advancing when the team left for Boston. But Fenway Park didn't spook the Indians and they took care of the Red Sox last weekend.

After New York's 7-2 victory in Game 1, there was talk of a Yankees sweep. There's no such discussion any longer and now the Indians are going home where strange October events have happened before.

"In a bunt situation, these are the kind of things that happen," outfielder Kenny Lofton said.

Juicy lineup set for NCAA D-I football weekend

By Richard Rosenblat
Associated Press

Road trip!

On a Saturday filled with pivotal games in the national title scramble, the top five teams hit the road. And only No. 1 Ohio State, which plays at Illinois, is expected to have an easy time remaining undefeated.

The teams chasing the Buckeyes, though, have it tough. Some tougher than others.

Here's the appetizing lineup:

No. 2 Nebraska (5-0), after a close-call 24-17 win last week, visits No. 18 Texas A&M (4-1) at College Station, where the Aggies are 50-5-1 under coach R.C. Slocum. To make matters worse, Huskers quarterback Bobby Newcombe is questionable with a sore knee.

No. 3 UCLA (5-0) travels to Tucson for a Pac-10 showdown against No. 10 Arizona (5-0) without leading rusher Jermaine Lewis, suspended for the game because of his involvement in a weekend fight.

Tailback Jamal Lewis is out for the season as No. 4 Tennessee (4-0) heads to Athens, Ga., for an SEC matchup against No. 7 Georgia. The Bulldogs (4-0) are riding high after a big win at LSU directed by freshman quarterback Quincy Carter.

No. 5 Kansas State (4-0) plays No. 14 Colorado (5-0) at Boulder, where the Wildcats last won in 1975.

Football's Moore grabs award

What do you call a wide receiver who caught 11 passes for 164 yards, tying the UMass single-game reception record?

You call him Jimmy Moore, the WHMP/UMass athlete of the week.

The senior transfer from Southern Methodist University is the third player from the UMass football team to receive this honor. Moore joins teammates tailback Marcel Shipp and quarterback Todd Bankhead, who have also won this honor this season.

Moore, a product of Austin, Texas, became the first Minuteman since Tim Berra in 1973 to catch 11 passes. Moore's record-setting performance helped lead UMass to a stunning 40-35 comeback victory over then No. 5 Hofstra.

As an experienced I-A transfer, Moore has begun to pace the offense lately. Besides his record setting performance against Hofstra, he also came through with a big game in the UMass home opener against Buffalo. In that game, Moore caught three passes for 99 yards, with two of those catches going for touchdowns.

For the season, Moore has accumulated 25 catches for 420 yards and four touchdowns. Moore leads the team in all three categories. He ranks 31st in the nation in receptions and ninth in the country in yards receiving per game.

Moore has been one of the key weapons for the Minutemen. He has helped lead them to a No. 24 ranking in the nation heading into this weekend's tilt with James Madison.

Martin no longer a Pat, but he's still a warrior

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. (AP) — One of Bill Parcells' favorite words to describe Curtis Martin is warrior. Last Sunday, Martin proved he deserves such a description.

Martin had 36 carries in a 20-9 victory over Miami, gaining 108 yards. Yesterday, Parcells revealed that 34 of those carries came after Martin bruised his right thigh, an injury most of Martin's teammates knew nothing about.

Martin hardly looked hampered by the injury against the Dolphins, but he's listed as questionable for this weekend's game at St. Louis.

"He just wouldn't come out of the game," Parcells said while Martin was in the trainer's room. "We knew about it. He did it the second play of the game. It was a pretty amazing thing."

If the Jets are without Martin, they'll use a committee approach to their running game. Leon Johnson is the natural choice as a replacement, but Parcells doesn't want to overwork him because of Johnson's duties on special teams.

"If I go with Leon, I've got to take Leon off some of these special teams," Parcells said. "He will still play the return teams, because of his impact, but I have to get him off coverage teams. There's a domino effect and it could hurt you."

The Jets also have fullbacks Keith Byars and Jerald Sowell and swingman Richie Anderson available for the backfield.

Byars was the only Jet who said he knew Martin was hurting against Miami, admitting Martin told him his leg was bothering him. But he fully expects Martin, the free agent who signed for six years and $36 million with the Jets this year after three 1,000-yard seasons in New England, to play at St. Louis.

"Everybody has a job to do and we think everyone can share in it and do the job," he said. "As far as I know, Curtis will be there on Sunday and he will play well, like he always does. But we know Leon can come in and spell Curtis and do a good job."

"We all prepare the same. They might not have the same talent, but they prepare the same."

Johnson barely has touched the ball on offense, although he's been a major contributor on special teams. And when's he gotten in the backfield, he's fared well.

He has eight rushes for 52 yards, an average bulked up by a 40-yard dash, and has two touchdowns. He also has four receptions for an impressive 25.3 average, including an 82-yard jaunt with a screen pass for a TD.

Parcells admits he wants Johnson more involved, particularly because of his game-breaking skills. Johnson, of course, wants that to, and might get the chance this Sunday.

"If I'm able to fill in and help out as much as possible, I'm eager for that task," he said. "If there is a situation where he wants me in the game, he will put me in."

Johnson was surprised when he learned Martin was hobbled during the Miami game.

Gretzky shares opinions while other legends make the news

NEW YORK (AP) — Wayne Gretzky doesn't pass himself off as a fashion expert. But he likes one of the new rules that dictates what NHL goalies can and cannot wear during games.

The league outlawed oversized chest protectors and jerseys, as well as those baggy pants so fashionable among goalies — all of which helped them stop pucks.

"They're clamping down and making sure the goaltenders stick to the guidelines" Gretzky said. "That is going to benefit all offensive players."

Gretzky described himself as a "huge traditionalist" and insisted the NHL doesn't need much improvement.

Yet, the New York Rangers star agreed that some recent developments were for the better — among them putting teams in Florida, Texas and California, going beyond Canada and the United States for players and expanding TV coverage.

"The game is better now than it was 20 years ago, and it will be better in 20 years than it is now," said Gretzky.

He was among those honored at the Sports Legends dinner benefiting the Buoniconti Fund, which raises money for the Miami Project to Cure Paralysis.

Magic remembers Larry

STILLWATER, Okla. (AP) — Magic Johnson relished the competition with Larry Bird when they were playing with the Los Angeles Lakers and the Boston Celtics.

"He got me so up to play," Johnson told the crowd at Oklahoma State.

"It's not like today, when you know the Bulls are going to win. What I miss are the playoffs. I miss Michael Jordan. I miss Larry Bird. If I could play them for 82 games a season, I'd still be out there."

Johnson said he was bothered that he couldn't be inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame with Bird, who coaches the Indiana Pacers.

Bird was inducted last weekend. Because of Johnson's comeback two years after his initial retirement, he is not eligible for induction for another two years.

"Larry is something special. I'll never forget those battles — the trash-talking. That man is one of those guys who actually scared me to death. He could beat you at any time and in so many ways. It was scary."

Johnson said he will never lose his will to win.

"When I play Larry Bird in checkers when we're 98, I'll want to beat him too."

Johnson, who was diagnosed in 1991 with the virus that causes AIDS, said his health is outstanding.

"It's been seven years now and (the virus) is lying dead in my body," he said. "I'm doing fine, and I'm happy everything is going well."

The Shark is baited

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) — This was no diamond in the rough. Greg Norman testified he was duped into buying jewels from his onetime friend, Jack Hasson, that actually were worth only a fraction of the hundreds of thousands of dollars he paid.

The Australian golfer was especially distressed to discover the diamond pin he'd designed for his wife in the shape of a Great White Shark — his business logo and nickname — was made with jewels that were painted.

The shark pin was 18-carat gold with multicolored diamonds — green, orange, blue and fuchsia. Norman said he didn't know diamonds didn't come in such colors, and Hasson, a jeweler in Palm Beach Gardens, assured him he could get the stones.

An appraiser later told Norman the value of the pin was $7,000 — not the $48,875 he paid.

NBA lockout looming over beginning of year

NEW YORK (AP) — Facing the possibility of the first shortened season in NBA history, owners and players resume labor talks today with few expectations of progress.

"We're ready to sit there and talk all day and all night and maybe someone will come up with something," NBA deputy commissioner Rubs Granik said. "Often that's how it happens, but I have no reason to be optimistic."

The bargaining session will be only the second between the sides since the lockout was imposed July 1.

The owners and players have only a couple of days to come up with a deal that will save an 82-game season, and such a breakthrough seems unlikely with the sides far apart on the main economic issues.

"I hope it's going to be substantive," players union director Billy Hunter said. "I'm going to tell David [Stern, the commissioner] what we don't like about their last proposal, and then suggest that we really talk about something that's going to create some movement on both sides."

The last time owners and players were together in the same room was Aug. 6, when the players made their most recent proposal, and the owners responded by walking out of the room.

Two hour-long informal sessions have been held in the last two weeks, with only Stern, Granik, Hunter and union president Patrick Ewing attending.

Both sides now expect the work stoppage to force the cancellation of games. The entire exhibition schedule has already been canceled, and the regular season is due to begin Nov. 1.

"We feel that the NBA is making a lot of money. Everybody, for the most part, is doing financially OK," Ewing said. "So we don't see why they had to lock us out. If you asked David Stern, I don't think he would say that the league as a whole is doing bad."

"Reason №4 why you should take my MCAT course."

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Avoid self-indulgence today. This can only lead to hardship, since you and your peers all want to have things come a little more easily at this time.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — When you indulge in memories of past accomplishments, take care that you don't let yourself settle into a false sense of security.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You can enjoy more romance at this time than you had bet on — but you must still engage your mind and approach things rationally.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Caution is advised, but you can still push ahead into unknown territory as long as you take into consideration the facts you have before you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Someone who has been a rival in the past is likely to express support for something you've been working on for some time. You'll get help.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Try not to lead anyone astray today— intentionally or otherwise. The truth is what will serve you best at this time, so stick to it.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You can prove yourself an advocate for many who seek to do something more profitable and beneficial at this time. Eagerly lend your support.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Risk–taking can pay off today, but you must avoid throwing caution to the wind. Focus on the few things that are certain.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — This is a good day to pick up where you left off, but you must work hard to decide just where that it. Don't leave anything to chance today.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You'll be jumping whenever someone in charge calls you today — but you can still maintain a certain level of autonomy if you work at it.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Productivity is all–important today, or so the competition would have you believe. However, the truth is that some things transcend productivity.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can and must be creative today. In order to maximize the rewards derived directly from love, get in touch with your "real" self.

Jets climb to power over rival Miami; Brister underrated

It was a grand week for Tuna's titans in the land of the swamp, much to my delight. The much maligned Jet franchise overcame great boundaries to overtake the man who has so often knifed their throats, Dan Marino.

No fake spikes or last minute heroics here, just old fashioned thrashing and a quick flight home for the fried fish.

From here the sky is the limit. With the lame duck St. Louis Rams on tap, expect another big day for the Jet offense, especially the man sent from Foxboro: Curtis Martin.

Speaking of the Pats, it became quite apparent as Pete Carroll's squad struggled to get out of the not-so-Superdome with a win over Mike Ditka's disciples that this is a team that will not be a shoo-in to win another AFC East title.

The defense that has won New England quite a few football games over the past few years just was not there last week, which must be a tremendous cause of concern with the bulk of the schedule yet to come.

Staying with the AFC, my man and yours, Bubby Brister, is proving once and for all that he is a competent, and moreover a quality NFL starting quarterback. Of course, I could have told you this when he was laboring as Pittsburgh's backup behind Neil O'Donnell. Needless to say nobody should be backing up O'Donnell for any type of occupation.

I am fully aware that with the likes of Terrell Davis, Shannon Sharpe and Ed McCaffrey to work with, Brister's work may look less impressive, but I assure you that not anybody could walk onto the field and perform as well as he has in the last two weeks.

Heading over to the NFC, and the other locker room at New Jersey's Meadowlands, the Giants have proven themselves once again to be nothing more than bunch of phonies.

These impostors that snuck up on the rest of their paltry division last year are not fooling anybody this year. The 2-3 Giants were trounced 20-3 by a sub-par Buccaneer outfit that had given up 96 points in their previous four games.

With Dallas regaining some of its momentum, and the Saints and Falcons playing fairly well, look for the Giants to drop out of playoff contention within the next 3-4 weeks.

It would be hard to argue against the fact that the Vikings look like legitimate Super Bowl contenders, after their impressive 37-24 triumph over the mighty Packers down in cheese land.

The resurrection of Rockin' Randall Cunningham came full circle in front of a "Monday Night" audience, as the ex- Eagle soared for 442 yards passing with 20-for-32 accuracy. The only thing missing in Cunningham's arsenal was his once familiar running game, as he was tabbed with minus- one yard rushed in only two attempts.

No complaints from Dennis Green as the Vikes lead the powerful NFC Central with a spotless 5-0 mark.

From the plentiful to the pitiful: the race to become the first 0-16 team is on, and my vote goes to the Philadelphia Eagles — no offense to the Washington Redskins or Carolina Panthers.

But after managing to fall behind 35-2 (those safeties are huge), to Denver last week, it has become apparent that they do not have enough talent to field a legitimate National Football League team. Fortunately for the Eagles and Skins they play each other twice, beginning with a 1 p.m. showdown at the Vet this Sunday. Look for the Skins to squeak one out 10-4 (two safeties for Philly) in this one.

The AFC game of the week appears to be the showdown between the Chiefs and Pats at Foxboro. Since the Patriots have given no indication that they can beat the teams that are clearly better than them, I will take the Chiefs by a landslide in this one.

In the NFC, the premier matchup of the week will feature 3-1 49ers heading to Louisiana to face the 3-1 Saints. Look for a barn burner in this one, as supreme offense will reign. The Niners are favored by a hefty 10 points, and look for them to have trouble making that cut with a 38-30 win.

On Monday night, in their battle for Florida's bragging rights, Jacksonville will continue its winning ways by exploiting an aging Marino to the tune of a 24-14 victory. But then again, don't count Miami out under the bright lights of "Monday Night Football."

Field hockey victim of penalty corners

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

After appearing unbreakable during the first 20 minutes of the game, it seemed as though the Massachusetts field hockey team was laying the foundation for its fifth victory of the season.

The following 50 minutes produced a much different result, as the host Minutewomen (4-5) fell to state-rival Boston University 3-0 last night in the first ever field hockey game held under the lights of Richard F. Garber Field.

Despite the fast start, the Minutewomen fell victim to mental mistakes, allowing the Terriers to convert two penalty corner shots, as well as one penalty stroke, into three goals for the visiting team.

"When you're cruising, you take things for granted," said second-year UMass coach Patty Shea, who felt that BU could have worked harder for its three tallies. "It's always frustrating when you come out on the low end. It really wasn't anything they generated. We made a lot of mental mistakes."

The first two Terrier goals developed almost identically, as BU senior Samantha Stewart notched her second and third scores of the season on penalty corner shots. The first goal was scored with 2:29 remaining in the opening half, and Stewart followed with another at the 15-minute mark in the second frame.

Sophomore forward Kate Cusick added the final goal for the Terriers, who managed to capitalize on what Shea believed were three Minutewoman mistakes.

"When you give up penalty corners, it's like a free shot on goal for the other team," she said. "That's what really gave them the momentum. All the mistakes we made, they jumped on."

After taking the first six penalty corner shots of the game, UMass allowed 11 consecutive BU tries, two of which resulted in Terrier points. Although the Minutewomen had 15 days of practice to prepare for their opponent, Shea believes that state rivalries such as this one can yield unexpected results.

"When you play in a regional contest, everything is up in the air," she said. "There's just such a rivalry... we knew what we needed to do. There's certain things that were are going to have to correct [for our next game]."

Trailing only by one goal early in the second half, UMass back Kerry Ann Iaggassar made the save of the game, diving forward to knock away a Terrier shot after Minutewoman goaltender Zowie Tucker was drawn out of the net.

"It was huge," said Shea, complimenting her freshman back for making the save which kept UMass alive for most of the second period. "Kerry Ann played outstanding today."

Still attempting to return to her pace before suffering a concussion in the opening game of the season, senior All- American forward Erica Johnston did not start for the Minutewomen, who look to rebound from the defeat with a victory against West Chester tomorrow.

"A lot of it's health," said Shea of Johnston's status. "We're going to start her slowly to try to get her back. We have to remember that our most important games are our conference games."

UMass will open Atlantic 10 Conference play tomorrow at 7 pm, as it hosts the Golden Rams in a rematch of last season's A-10 Tournament Championship game.

"The next game is so important for us," said Minutewoman captain Kate Putnam, hoping that her team avoids any costly mistakes. "We cannot let up."

UM volleyball streak ends at URI with loss

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The three-game conference win streak for the Massachusetts volleyball team is over.

UMass took to the court last tonight at Keaney Gymnasium in Kingston, R.I., where it ran into a much improved Rhode Island Rams team and fell, 3-1.

The Rams' win improved their record to 11-2, 5-2 in the Atlantic 10. The Minutewoman loss hurts them in the conference, as they fall to 7-9, 4-3 in the A-10.

The Minutewomen had recently come up with two big conference wins last weekend against George Washington University and Fordham. The Minutewomen should have been riding high, but their flight was met by the Rams.

Rhode Island jumped out first and stole game one 15-10. In game two, however, UMass begun to find it's stride and fought a tough up and down game to win 16-14.

In game two, UMass came back from nearly an impossible situation as they were down 14-12 in game two, but came back strong to win 16-14, as they had been able to do in the previous weekend.

Game three was no different, except this time the Minutewomen felt a bit short. UMass hung tough

Indians end up with improbable victory

By Tom Withers
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Cue the Twilight Zone theme music. The Cleveland Indians are winning bizarre postseason games again.

For some strange reason, when one of the Indians squares around to bunt in the 12th inning, good things seem to happen to Cleveland.

Enrique Wilson's mad dash and comical dive across the plate in the 12th yesterday allowed the Indians to even the American League championship series 1-1 with a 4-1 victory over the New York Yankees.

For the first time since that fateful 11th inning of Game 7 in Florida last October, extra innings didn't bring extra heartache to Cleveland. And for the second straight year, there may be something magical about these Indians.

Magical or lucky.

"In a game like this, sometimes you need some luck," David Justice said.

In Game 3 of the ALCS last year, Cleveland beat Baltimore when Omar Vizquel missed a squeeze bunt and the ball got past Orioles catcher Lenny Webster, allowing Marquis Grissom to score the winning run.

Before they took on the Yankees juggernaut this week, the Indians knew that along with good pitching and hitting, they might need some breaks to make it back to the World Series.

And as the adage goes, sometimes it's better to be lucky than good.

"They won 114 games this season by finding a way to win," reliever Mike Jackson said of the Yankees. "And I think the tables turned tonight."

Wilson, pinch-running in the 12th after Jim Thome's leadoff single, scored all the way from first on Travis Fryman's controversial bunt single.

His arms flailing as he tried to stay upright, Wilson slid across the plate on his belly to give the Indians an improbable Game 2 victory that will surely go down with the some of October's most bizarre baserunning plays.

"That's why they have all those great video highlight tapes," said David Justice, whose fourth-inning homer had given the Indians a 1-0 lead. "Something that doesn't happen during the regular season seems to always happen in the postseason. This is one of those situations where we needed a break and we got one." The Indians led a charmed existence last October, and now they're doing it again. They weren't supposed to beat the Yankees and did. They were underdogs against the Orioles and somehow ended their season early, too.

Cleveland opened this postseason by getting routed at home by Boston, but despite manager Mike Hargrove and

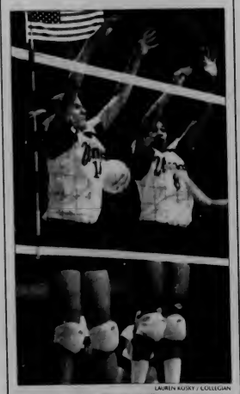
Pats' Brisby ready for Chiefs' corners

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Vincent Brisby had trouble last season getting passes thrown his way. This Sunday against the Pro Bowl cornerbacks from Kansas City, he may have problems catching them.

He's hardly afraid to try, even though he knows Dale Carter and James Hasty will be bumping New England's receivers at the line of scrimmage.

"We like guys who come up in our face and challenge us," Brisby said yesterday. "You just have to go out there and be physical off the bat and let them know that they're in for a war and they'll back off."



Brisby is back for a sixth season with the Patriots after requesting and receiving permission to seek a trade in the offseason. Now he's part of an effective four-man wide-receiver rotation with Terry Glenn, Shawn Jefferson and Troy Brown. "I feel like I'm part of what's going on and that's what I really wanted," Brisby said. "To get an opportunity to make plays in crucial points of the game is important to me."

He did that twice in Sunday's 30-27 win at New Orleans. He caught a 6-yard scoring pass from Drew Bledsoe as the Patriots took a 10-7 lead nearly 10 minutes into the second quarter. Then, with 43 seconds left in the game and the score tied at 27, he caught a 27-yard pass for a first down at the Saints' 18, setting up Adam Vinatieri's winning field goal.

"It's just a matter of taking advantage of every opportunity," Brisby said.

It won't be easy Sunday against

Louisville basketball appeals NCAA ruling

LOUISVILLE (AP) — The University of Louisville is arguing against the ruling that the school's men's basketball program is a repeat rules violator.

The notice of appeal also said the facts in an NCAA report returned last month did not support a finding of a "major" violation in the basketball program. The notice was not more specific.

"After careful consideration and consultation, I have decided to notify the NCAA of our intent to appeal a limited portion of the recent action of the infractions committee," University of Louisville President John Shumaker said in a statement.

On Sept. 23, the NCAA's infractions committee gave the university a number of penalties for what it said were nine rules violations. The penalties include a ban on preseason and postseason men's basketball competition for 1998-99, including the Conference USA tournament.

The women's volleyball program also was placed on probation in a separate NCAA finding the university is not appealing.

For the basketball program, the school is asking for a hearing so it can make its case in person.

The most serious basketball violation appeared to cen-

Yankee Stadium's future still up in the air

NEW YORK (AP) — The fate of Yankee Stadium now goes to the voters.

A Bronx judge ruled today the city can hold a referendum in November on whether taxpayers want a new billion-dollar stadium on Manhattan's West Side.

The decision by State Supreme Court Justice Douglas McKeon is a victory for City Council Speaker Peter Vallone, who has bitterly disputed the issue with Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

Yankees owner George Steinbrenner has said Vallone's actions could prompt him to move the team from New York. The lease on the famed 75-year-old ballpark expires in 2002.

Steinbrenner, who also has made overtures about a move to New Jersey, has said he will disclose his plans after the season. He wouldn't comment on the judge's decision.

"We're in the midst of a postseason, trying to bring a World Series to the city and we will not get involved in politics. Our only focus is on bringing a championship to New York," he said today before the Yankees played the Indians in the second game of the AL championship series.

Giuliani has said the city shouldn't limit options for the Yankees, whether in the Bronx or Manhattan. The mayor did not immediately comment, but his press secretary, Colleen Roche, said the city will appeal.

McKeon's 15-page ruling said, "When the expenditure of public funds approaching $1 billion is estimated to build a new stadium does it offend the spirit of the [city] Charter to permit the public to participate in that decision?" He decided it did not. Questions over the stadium's future have been heightened since the collapse of a 500-pound steel beam this year, which forced the stadium to shut temporarily.

Vallone supports keeping the team in the Bronx, a position with overwhelming public support. Vallone, a Democrat seeking to oust Republican Gov. George Pataki, contends the public has a right to be heard on a project that could involve hundreds of millions of government dollars.

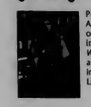
But Giuliani called the referendum a political gimmick intended to boost the vote for Vallone in the heavily Democratic city. He established a charter commission to keep the referendum off the Nov. 3 ballot.

Vallone labeled the commission a "sham" that "effectively curtails and encroaches on the power of the Council."

Rockies promise to support Leyland

DENVER (AP) — Jim Leyland became the new manager of the Colorado Rockies because he knew he wouldn't be the only free agent the team would sign.

Armed with the promise that fan-rich Colorado will pursue premium free agents such as Mike Piazza and Kevin Brown, Leyland was introduced yesterday as the second manager in Rockies history. Leyland praised fired manager Don Baylor and said he will always be remembered as the first manager of the Rockies.



"I bring no special tonic with me," he said after putting on a Rockies shirt. "I can be ornery at times. I can be cold at times. I can be rough at times. Don't take that too seriously. I'm dedicated to getting this organization into postseason play."

Given a $6 million, three-year contract, a record for a manager, Leyland plans on staying longer than the two roller-coaster years he spent in Florida.

French results negative; Iraq denies nerve agent

PARIS (AP) — France on Thursday asked the U.N. commission investigating Iraq's weapons to determine whether nerve gas has been found on Iraqi warheads.

A French official denied a published report that French experts had detected traces of the nerve gas VX on Iraqi warheads, and also that France withheld the findings because it didn't want to undermine Baghdad's attempts to get U.N. sanctions lifted.

The New York Times reported Wednesday that testing on samples from the weapons show evidence of chemicals linked to VX, a drop of which on the skin, or inhaled, can kill an adult within minutes.

Iraq, which has been the subject of seven years of U.N. weapons inspections, has admitted it tried to make VX, but denied it was ever able to make enough, or stabilize it sufficiently, to load into weapons.

Swiss tests on warheads turned up negative. But a U.S. Army laboratory concluded that missile fragments contained traces of the gas.

Glenn chastises press; wants focus on science

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — John Glenn scolded reporters Thursday for focusing too much on his age and fame and not enough on the scientific merits of his upcoming space shuttle flight. With just three weeks until liftoff, the 77-year-old senator launched a verbal assault at nearly 100 journalists gathered at the launch pad for the crew's practice countdown.

"Let me castigate the press a moment here," said Glenn, flanked by his six shuttle crewmates. "Too often you get into the human aspects of this and you don't get into the scientific stuff that gets into everybody's house all over this country."

In 1962, Glenn became the first American to orbit the Earth. He left NASA in 1964 and has served as a Democratic senator from Ohio since 1975. When he soars aboard Discovery, he will be the oldest person ever in space.

"I know it's easy to report the 'oh, gee whiz' of the personal aspects of this thing," he said. "But this is science at its very best out there on the cutting edge and I'd sure invite you to get in there and report that."

UMASS Faculty Meets

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts Senator Stanley Rosenberg and State Representative Ellen Story both spoke for the first few minutes to kick off the first faculty senate meeting of the semester yesterday.

In her speech, Story spoke about the University's increase in the budget over the past few years. She credited the increase to the Legislature, and criticized Celluci's lower budget proposals. She also said that Weld-appointed Chair of the Board of Higher Education James Carlin thinks education should be run "like an insurance company."

Story added that the upcoming election on Nov. 3 will be "a crucial one for public higher education." She also added that a democrat would be needed for higher office, saying that way, the "University will get respect again."

Massachusetts Senator Stanley Rosenberg also addressed the faculty by warning them to think about "when we are going to be on our next economic downfall."

He said that although the economy is doing well, the faculty should consider what will happen to the University when the economy slows down again. Rosenberg reminded the audience of the economy troubles in Massachusetts from '88 to 92', and how higher education lost money.

"Don't be so complacent about the economy," he chided.

Rosenberg promoted the "Fair Share Plan," which is waiting to be passed in the House of Representatives. According to Rosenberg and Story, the Fair Share plan would allow the budget to contain a certain amount of money for higher education regardless of the economy. Rosenberg expressed the need for a coalition to help push the Fair Share bill through the house, where it is apparently stalling.

John Bracy, Secretary of the Faculty Senate and professor of African American studies, said that this year's budget, "was the greatest in the history of UMass."

When asked, Rosenberg also said that the faculty contract was waiting in the House of Representatives to be

Congress enveloped by moral debate

By Mike Massaros
Collegian Staff

The specter of Richard Nixon hung over Congress yesterday, as the impeachment debate raged on the Senate floor.

Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich called it "one of the most important votes we will have," before opening the floor to debate. For the third time in American history, Congress voted on whether or not to begin an impeachment inquiry.

When the dust settled and the ballots were cast, Congress voted to proceed with the inquiry 258 to 176. Thirty-one Democrats broke rank and voted with the Republicans; no Republicans voted against proceeding, although one did not vote.

Before the vote, Congressional Democrats appealed to their fellow senators yesterday in a short, angry televised debate that was filled with vitriol and finger-pointing. "Is that the precedent we're setting?" asked Rep. John Conyers (D – Mich.), a member of the Judiciary committee, referring to the ongoing inquiry into President Clinton's sex life and the millions of dollars spent on it.

Rep. Barney Frank (D – Mass.) referred to the investigation of Whitewater and other issues derogatorily as "deep-sea fishing," with Republicans looking for anything on the president, his enemies searching through "dry holes."

On the other side of the debate, Rep. James Rogan (R – Cal.) asked whether congress could "turn a blind eye" to what has been found so far.

That seems to be the question. Is the government willing to look the other way for the sake of the presidential office or for the country? Or should it do what many Republicans are saying it should do, and follow what has been laid out by the constitution? Rep. Rogan stated that it was their duty to be "faithful to our founders and heirs." Rep. Paul McHale (R – Pa.) said "if in disgust or dismay we would sweep aside this immoral conduct, what dangerous precedent would we set? We can't define the president's character, but we must define the nation's."

Rep. David Bonior (D – Mich.), eloquently and animatedly, recognized that the president was "wrong" and "should be held accountable," but also recognized that the vote could be impeded by "grinding gears in partisan stalemate." Anger rose in his voice as he described the truncated debate as "a charade of justice," using words like "railroaded" and "hit and run" to describe the lack of debate on such an important issue. He received a standing ovation as a result.

Democrats participating in the debate repeatedly decried the sexual focus of the inquiry and the fact that they may be as tired of it all as the public is. "Do we really want two more years of Monica Lewinsky?" asked an obviously tired Bonior.

Rep. Henry Hyde, the Judiciary Chair, wearily applauded: "I'm sorry you felt you were shortchanged by this debate," saying he had no intention of having the proceedings drag on and on, but said that it was all necessary. He rejected the claims of the Democrats that this was purely a sexual issue, likening it to Watergate, saying this is not purely about sex, like Watergate was not solely about "a third rate burglary."

Besides the length of the debate, the biggest sticking point among the speakers was the amount of time the impeachment process would take. Bonior called for an end, for the sake of all Americans and for the sake of more important issues that need to be dealt

UMass tired of scandal,

End to conflict awaited

With Republicans and Democrats deciding the fate of President Clinton, some local residents want to see the focus shifted to other issues.

"It's been blown out of proportion, turned into a soap opera and makes a mockery of our country," said sophomore psychology major, Emily Sampson.

This opinion is echoed around the country, but some people are wishing that the whole episode would just go away, and Clinton with it.

"I'd like to see him resign," said John Wade, a hospital counselor. "There is a whole world out there getting poorer and poorer and we are dwelling on this."

Wade also referred to the litany of economic problems across the globe, including the decline in Asian markets as well as disarray in Russia.

On the other side of the argument are people like University of Massachusetts professor of American government, Jeff Kramer. Kramer points out that the country is doing well economically under Clinton's administration compared to foreign markets.

"This president shows a remarkable ability to compartmentalize his life," Kramer said.

Despite this sense of division between public and private life, some argue that Clinton will simply not be effective as a policy maker for the next two years considering this situation.

"The Republicans are going to be holding this over the Democrats for who knows how long," said Shawn Flaherty, a chemistry major.

"Clinton has worse offenses concerning his foreign and domestic policy decision making," University of Massachusetts professor Jen Trachen said.

Local residents listed domestic and foreign policy concerns, from the continued sanctions on Iraq, and retaliation bombings in Sudan to Social Security and environmental issues.

Last Monday, the chief investigative counsel for the Republican Party presented an alleged 15 impeachable offenses as evidence that President Clinton was part of a conspiracy to obstruct justice. This is reason enough for Congress to open a formal and open-ended impeachment investigation as recommended on Monday by the House Judiciary committee.

Congress vs. polls in Clinton debate

By Mike Feinsilber
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Outside the Capitol, in democracy's rite of renewal, a president took office 20 months ago. Inside that marble temple Thursday, with no bands playing and none of the uplift of a new beginning, lawmakers cheerlessly voted to proceed toward impeaching him.

The moment was solemn, maybe historic, but most of the debate lacked the passion that even a road-building bill can provoke. Few voices rose.

"Obviously a very difficult time for every member of this House," said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif.

Still, Henry Hyde of Illinois said the task had to be done.

"We must listen to that still, small voice that whispers in our ear: Duty, duty, duty," Hyde intoned.

The suspenseless debate occurred before mostly empty benches. An irked Rep. David Obey, D-Wis. asked that for so important a matter, members be instructed to "get their tails here."

Public opinion polls rate Clinton more favorably than Congress and reflect a disposition to put aside the investigations of Clinton's sexual misbehavior with Monica Lewinsky and his sworn testimony about it. The polls also reflect majorities opposed to impeachment.

Helpful riding program Seeks eager volunteers

By Juli. Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Saying that seven-year-old Tyler Baronis of Sunderland looks forwards to his Monday and Wednesday mornings is an understatement.

As Tyler, who is blind, is helped onto his favorite horse, Eve, by a volunteer, his mother Lisa Baronis looks on at her smiling son. Here, volunteers actively facilitate the riding, while also helping the children theraputically.

Tyler has been coming to the Hadley Horse Farm since July for therapeutic horseback riding lessons from the PVTRA (Pioneer Valley Therapeutic Riding Association).

"He loves it," said Mrs. Baronis. "He looks forward to coming. He's blind and can't do sports like this. He talks about this all the time."

The PVTRA is a non-profit organization operating out of Belchertown that offers these lessons at the Wooden Horse Farm in Thorndike, at Mount Holyoke College, and at the Hadley Farm (part of the University).

Lisle Hislop started the program at the University of Massachusetts last winter.

"I began working with therapeutic riding since 1972," she said, "I was a UMass student and rode horses. I was disillusioned by all the competitive riding."

Luckily, Hislop realized the potential of this a good idea, which included the use of horses for therapy, and called NARA (North American Riding Association) for information about it, and eventually became a master licensed instructor through them.

She then contacted the PVTRA about starting a program at Hadley farm. With the help of UMass Equine Studies Director Dr. Doug Freeman, also on the board of directors at PVTRA, Hislop started offering the lessons.

"It's doing very well," Hislop said, "They [the riders with disabilities] feel a lot better about themselves. Physically, they are using muscles they don't usually use."

She added, "It's pretty exciting to control the animal. People with physical disabilities don't usually get feedback. The horse feeds the body a regular symmetrical movement."

Lisa Baronis, Tyler's mother, said the principal at her son's school came to the farm to check out the program, and now Tyler is getting school credit for it. The program is also physically rewarding for Tyler.

"It s helped out a lot with balance and posture. Blind people tend to not keep their head up," she said.

There is already a waiting list for those hopeful of becoming participants.

Hislop said they are currently seeking more volunteers for their lessons at the Hadley Farm, which are Mondays and Wednesdays at 10 AM.

"They [potential volunteers] should like to work with people and not be afraid of horses," she said. "Volunteers should be able to commit to the time."

Hislop elaborated on the personal rewards of witnessing the disabled children ride, and the emotional growth that occurs as they learn to trust themselves and the animals.

Too often, physically handicapped children are sheltered from sports and other conceivably dangerous outdoor activities when such participation can actually stimulate confidence within the children.

It is possible, said Hislop, that students might be able to get credit for their time through the Veterinary and Animal Sciences Department. Students should contact the department for more information regarding academic credit at 545-5564.

"This is a great opportunity for students thinking of becoming physical therapists, occupational therapists, recreational therapists, or riding instructors," Hislop said.

Those interested in volunteering should contact Hislop at (413) 283-3706.

passed.

After Story and Rosenberg spoke, different announcements were made. The Ad Hoc committee, which was created last May to assess the role of the office of the Vice Chancellor for Research and recommend if any changes are needed, has submitted a report. Members of the committee will be at the next meeting on Oct. 22 to answer questions about the report.

Elections were held as well for this year's faculty senate officers. For this upcoming year, Ernest May will be presiding officer. Arthur Kinney and Lisa Saunders are associate delegates to the Board of Trustees, and Joseph Larson is chair of the Rules committee.

The senate also approved the physics course, "The Big Bang to Black Holes," and the consumer studies courses, "Child, Family and Community," " International Merchandising," and "Twentieth Century Fashion." The courses will be offered officially next semester.

Campaign UMass's progress report was also submitted. The campaign is part of the Office of University Advancement. It's fundraising performance has doubled in three years, and there are now 9,100 alumni association members, which represents a 100 percent growth in three years.

A summary of the new dismissal hearing procedures for faculty was distributed at the meeting; however, the procedures are not yet official.

The graduate senate spoke on the need for affordable family housing for graduate students. They also called attention to the effect welfare reform may have on the graduate students at UMass.

■ debate

with.

Minority Leader Dick Gephardt (D – Mo.) spoke most passionately to the representatives, saying that this was the "time to be bigger than we really are." Trying to break through the partisanship that is so frustrating to both parties, Gephardt said that "we all give in to pettiness and pride," but now was the time to put that all aside, repeating that they have to be "bigger and better than we really are." Looking out over the two assembled parties and houses, he recognized the problem of the whole ordeal: "We just don't trust each other." This was greeted with an excited, maybe surprised, murmur from the crowd.

He also questioned the length of the investigation, saying that it must be ended quickly, and that it all hurts the country and its children.

After the historic vote, Rep. Hyde said that he believed the hearings would start after the November 3rd elections, and that the inquiry would be complete by the end of the year. Throughout the debate he pointed to the Nixon impeachment proceedings as the model they were to follow in "this excursion," as he called it in what some Congressmen found to be an all too light manner, judging by the low rumble that followed it. With that, President Clinton came one step closer to unemployment.

American prisoner transferred for tests

LIMA, Peru (AP) — Prison authorities on Wednesday transferred an American woman serving a life sentence for treason in a prison high in Peru's frigid Andes mountains to another penitentiary for medical tests.

New York-native Lori Berenson, 28, was moved from Yanamayo prison 12,700 feet above sea level to Socabaya prison in the department of Arequipa, a National Penitentiaries Institute news release said.

Socavaya is 5,000 feet lower than Yanamayo and its conditions are less harsh.

Berenson, a former Massachusetts Institute of Technology student, was transferred along with three male prisoners.

"She's been moved to undergo specialized medical tests, but there is nothing seriously wrong with her health," penitentiary institute spokesman Henry Williams said.

Williams would not say what the tests were for or if the move to Socavaya, 470 miles southeast of Lima, was permanent. The length of her stay "depends on the results of the tests," he said. Berenson has suffered constant health problems during more than two years in Yanamayo. Her cell has no glass over its window, and the freezing wind means she must sleep under eight blankets. She must bathe in cold water.

Strike day three; teens' violence disables public

PARIS (AP) — More than 1 million rail commuters were stranded and traffic was snarled across Paris on Thursday, the third day of a transport strike by angered and frightened conductors.

Prime Minister Lionel Jospin was expected to announce tough measures to curb violence on buses and trains, responding to demands by drivers for protection from youthful criminals. Traffic jams stretched up to 20 miles as motorists tried to beat the strike, which left suburban rail services virtually paralyzed. Radio reports said at least 1 million workers were stranded at train stations.

Justice Ministry sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said expected measures include longer sentences for anyone convicted of physical assault and speedy trials.

There was some relief in the capital with bus services resuming. The city's transit system deployed police on their bus lines, prompting drivers to return to work. Also, the subway was not affected.

The walkout was triggered by an attack Monday night on a train where a worker was beaten with a spray can after he tried to stop youths from vandalizing a station.

Headed for Hell

As I stepped out of my class and allowed my professor's enthralling and compassionate lecture to wash away my Monday morning blues, I felt unusually inclined to head for the library and research some of the information that I had just absorbed in class. Yet, to my surprise, individuals who lined the campus pathway held signs that informed me I was not headed for the library. On the contrary, the signs read, "You Are Deceived And Headed For Hell."

Although the UMASS library and Hell can be easily perceived as two synonymous terms, I had a feeling that these people were going to encourage me to take the road less traveled; that is, to jump off the highway of Hell that our society has supposedly constructed and, instead, join them on a path to eternal salvation. As I made a split–second decision to opt for Hell, I mean the library, I was soon approached by a young boy, no older than ten, who anxiously handed me a pamphlet. Not wanting to discourage his ambition and determination for solicitation, I hesitantly took the paper and shoved it into my bag, all in one inconspicuous motion. Surely, I did not want people to think that I was condoning such a message. As I privately read the pamphlet, hoping to gain some newfound insight, I discovered the literature was not insightful at all. Rather, it was quite spiteful and oddly disturbing.

"College. Preparing you for a Future in Hell," is the statement I first focused on. Now, I can't help but agree that it was getting a little hot in my lecture halls, but the professors were not yet beginning to resemble Satan. On a more serious note, I am a firm believer that college is preparation for the future, but whether that future is a hellish one or not will be a reflection of the choices that I make. The pamphlet then proceeded to cynically state, "You suck up and you suck in, to this system into which you were born. You know of nothing else. From childhood you are commanded to answer, 'What are you going to be in this world?'"

> "I was soon approached by a young boy, no older than ten, who anxiously handed me a pamphlet."
> Kate Fredette

One of the reasons that a great majority of students, including myself, are in college is to broaden our minds, not to become narrow–minded. It is here that I hope to acquire the academic and social skills necessary to enter the world and make a small but significant mark, and to help people help themselves. In essence, I want to do the work which God, or a higher being, may ultimately wish people to do. I must admit that I am sick and tired of trying to formulate an intelligent and believable answer to the question, "What are you going to be in this world?" However, it is a question that all of us must contemplate from time to time.

Will our answers change over time? Of course they will. The only truthful answer you can give is that you are going to be in this world the person who you are today, and there is absolutely nothing wrong with that.

Those individuals who made their cause known to the UMASS community may view this institution of higher education as a place where brainwashing its students to conform to certain societal standards is acceptable and condoned. If that were the case, then I would have to charge that group as being guilty of the same crime. Weren't those children, such as the young boy who handed me the pamphlet, being deceived also? Those impressionable young minds may be told only one side of the story when in reality there exist many other chapters that are worthy of further investigation. Those children may be denied the choice to conduct their own investigation of life. As much as those adults want others to believe just how selfless they are, they may be using young children to their own advantage. Would I have taken one of those pamphlets had a young, sweet boy not handed it out? I most certainly would not have.

The same legal foundations of our nation, established by our forefathers, that have revolutionized and liberalized America by bringing such issues to the forefront as women's rights, homosexuality, and differences among family values, have also allowed those individuals the right to speak freely on this campus today. Yet, the issues I have just mentioned are not supported at all in the literature I received. Rather, they are seen as the source of all evil. Without the occurrence of change and revolution in our society, stagnancy would create a bitter stench. Without amendments such as the right of free speech, peaceful protest, and religion, those individuals would not be provided an open forum to speak freely on their beliefs. If we as a community, and as educated individuals, are able to accept and even appreciate their God–given rights, then they also owe others the same respect.

As I escaped from the gates of the library and for a second time passed those individuals who had come to intrigue me so much, I looked up at the signs they held and let the words, "You Are Deceived And Headed For Hell," become permanently branded in my memory. As I paused for a brief moment and thought about asking them for directions to Hell, I quickly realized that there is not one direct route that will eventually lead us into a Heaven or a Hell. We must first go down dead–end streets, overcome roadblocks, and encounter detours before we hit the smooth pavement. So, don't be deceived, because the road less traveled is usually the one where the greatest rewards are reaped and where our footprints leave the most distinguished marks.

Letters to the Editor

Northeast is not a hoax

I am responding to Mr. Rob Sullivan's editorial "Northeast is a hoax!" (Oct. 6). He writes, "Without Northeast, the entire school would tip under the psychic weight of Southwest and go spilling into Hadley." This is true. Without Northeast, the University would be missing several key components, which portray UMass as a welcoming and diverse institution of higher education.

The residents of Northeast are treated to a special feeling, one that is not found in any other residential area. A strong feeling of community. Northeast residents all share unique qualities which can be felt throughout the Quad. In fact, all residence halls open up to the Quad, our grassy commons where friends can, and often do, meet each other to play soccer, volleyball, Frisbee, and football, among other activities. This unique quality enhances the feeling of community in Northeast.

> "Northeast residents are not hermits; they are productive and successful student of UMass."

In response to Mr. Sullivan's claim where he states "I've never met any residents of Northeast," the question arises as to whether or not his eyes were open. Northeast residents tend to enjoy spending their time involving themselves in exciting activities. Northeast residents are not hermits; they are productive and successful students of UMass. When not at home, however, Northeast residents are just like those of Sylvan, Orchard Hill, Central, and Southwest. For example, numerous residents are involved with Massachusetts sports teams and athletic organizations. In fact, Massachusetts crew members have been proudly wearing their Crew jackets at home in Northeast. And it's never hard to find the captivating band members from Northeast who make up "The Power and Class of New England," the UMass Minuteman Marching Band.

Among Northeast's excellent students, you will find in multitudinous numbers, sharp engineering students who are a part of the University's First Year Engineering Program. The engineering program can be found In Northeast's Crabtree, Knowlton, and Mary Lyon residence halls. And where would any student be without the necessary tools provided to enhance their education?

Northeast has many of the materials necessary to be successful. Crabtree and Hamlin residence halls are Ethernet–equipped. Furthermore, Northeast's geographical location couldn't serve its residents better. The average walk to a Northeast resident's class is short since the area is easily accessible to campus.

Northeast residents are just as diverse as they are academically driven. In fact, according to Housing Services, Northeast has the only Asian–American floor. You will find a strong Asian community within Northeast, among many other diverse nationalities. In fact, Thatcher Residence Hall is the home of the International Program and the Nine– Month Housing Program. In Thatcher, you will meet Japanese, French, German, and Spanish residents who live in Northeast over their vacation breaks, as it may be more difficult for them to return home than for the average student.

As a culturally diverse living area, Northeast is also a welcoming home to a variety of special interest programs. Hamlin Residence Hall, in addition to having the Ethernet technology, is an all–male hall, and Knowlton is an all– female hall, in addition to hosting its first–year engineering program. And the fourth floor of Mary Lyon residence hall is home to the 2 in 20 Program.

For residents who enjoy working out, Northeast has its residential Wellness Center located in Johnson residence hall. Furthermore, Northeast is directly located across from Totman gym, which houses a Body Shop. Whether you're looking for a special interest program or you just want to get in shape, Northeast offers many, if not all, possibilities.

Northeast residents are special, thanks to the community feeling among them. Northeast doesn't restrict or discourage this wonderful feeling of neighborly character, especially since it was designed as a community. Northeast even has working fireplaces for friends to gather by during the colder seasons. With such a strong community come strong and cherished friendships.

As one of the five at–large student senators of Northeast, I'd be damned if I sat on my hands and did not defend the community that entrusted me with the confidence to do so. Furthermore, I do enjoy living in Northeast. In regards to Mr. Sullivan's flippant remark in which he observes that orientation is held in Northeast to "make people not want to come to UMass," I reply: I am proud to be a UMass Minuteman. UMass is the enticing crown jewel of the Bay State and has much to offer. The diversity and strong community character that Northeast provides for this campus are important contributions. Go UMass!

Get off the couch!

It is 2:23 a.m. (somebody is peeing outside my basement Mackimmie window!), and I am listening to the incredible Sarah McLachlan whose words are pushing me to sit here and write. She says,"Don't let your life pass you by," and I ponder that thought as I lay here on my green–striped K–mart pull out couch. Then everything I am not doing with my life suddenly comes fumbling out of my mouth to my poor roommate, who has to listen to me whine. I start to debate all sorts of questions in my life such as: when will I find the right guy? what if I don't want to be a journalism major? and what if I don't want to take the goat trail up to Orchard Hill?

College is only four years long and almost a year and a half has already slipped through my fingers. And what do I have to show for it, but a lousy GPA and a bad collection of pictures from the freshman year poster sale (yeah, that was me who bought the Titanic poster).

> "Take the opportunity to do whatever you are interested in while the chances are being served to you on a Berkshire DC tray."
> Aimee Wallis

Returning to school this year I planned to continue the extra curricular activities that I took part in last year. However, somewhere in between leaving UMass last May, and returning to a new dorm which reeks with the stench of urine this fall, I seemed to have gotten lost amidst the incoming freshman and my own confusion as to what I want to get involved in. I am off–kilter and need to find my niche again as does everyone on campus.

College isn't about graduating with the knowledge of every class you took during your four or maybe five years here, but it is about the way you have changed as a person due to the classes you have taken here, the people you have met and the food you have eaten (tofu ball ...). It is all about the experience and nothing more than that. However, don't think that you don't have to study, because in order to get that "college experience" you need to stay in school and not just by the skin of your teeth. Hey, you need to learn SOMETHING while you're here.

The key to the "UMass experience" is doing activities with people that you enjoy being with. You can't sit and read the paper everyday while wishing you could write for it. Take the initiative, go down to the Collegian, conveniently located in the basement of the campus center, and say, "Hey, I wanna write!" You can't be afraid. This is the place to get rid of these kinds fears before you enter the real world. Without experience, no respectable person is going to take you seriously out there. Oh, you thought this was the real world? News flash! There are no UMass debit cards that mommy and daddy pay for in the "real world," and if you don't get an article finished on time in the "real world," you are liable to get fired, leaving you financially challenged.

Wake up! This is your chance to get a jump start on the future so take the opportunity to do whatever you are interested in while the chances are being served to you on a Berkshire DC tray. (Sorry folks, there are no silver platters at UMass.) Granted you may not see a sign advertising something you want to do, but you can probably find it if you look for it. (Yes you may have to actually walk around campus – can you handle it?)

Pardon the sarcasm, but I get frustrated by the fact that so many people don't get involved in all the college opportunities offered. You know who you are. I hear you rattle your keys when you come in the dorm and slip into your dark (and might I add smelly) room, only to hear the television blasting from it moments later. I don't know your names because I can barely catch a glimpse of your face, but you're antisocial with a capital A! Don't you wanna make friends and find interests that other people share with you? Personally I find the whole concept quite exciting, but hey, maybe I am just weird.

Some people may think that their friends from home are the only ones who truly understand them, and they just can't connect with anyone here. But in college, especially at UMass of all places, there are people just like you! Last year I met someone one day, and today she is my best friend. To think that I would have never met her if I hadn't ventured from my room last year. (A–hem! Hello? Couch dwellers?)

Go live at home if you wanna hide in your rooms all day, but otherwise come party (no drinking of course). Go to a house council meeting, check out Mission Improvable on Saturday nights, join the Outing Club or make a club of your own. Do something. If I can get one of my anti–social floor mates to crawl out from under his/her bed and join the human race of UMass, then my goal here is accomplished.

So try and ignore those noises outside your dorm room window and think about the next couple of years at UMass and how you want to remember it in the future.

Hey you!! We're looking for writers to put in their two cents against the smoking ban. We want a clear, well–written, and concise piece, 800–1000 words long, and we would prefer to have them by noon on Tuesday, October 20th at the latest. You can bring your column down to the Collegian office in the basement of the campus center, and if you have any questions, please call Alexis or Mike at 5– 1491.

Adam Sandler: King of Stupid

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

When we last saw Adam Sandler, he and his hair were kicking out the jams in The Wedding Singer. This fall he trades his Culture Club cd's and sensitive guy act for a football jersey as he returns to snotty, stoopid form in The Waterboy. Say what you will about the guy's acting range, his movies at least have the virtue of being funny. Like Chris Farley, Sandler puts such an incredible amount of passion into every joke that you have to root for him. It's no surprise that his movies have become so popular with suburban kids and college students. Sandler throws tantrums like a two–year old with the loopy imagination of a seven– year old and the emotional maturity of a thirteen–year old, yet he always saves the day. He's the super–hero for the brat in all of us.

With the release of The Waterboy approaching, it's a good time to look back on some of his other releases, all of which go really well with peanut–butter sandwiches and milk at two o'clock in the morning.

Happy Gilmore: Sandler is an incompetent hockey player who discovers he is a natural golfer. He uses his mile–long drives to get on the pro–tour and win money to save his Grandma's house. Along the way he gets in a fist fight with Bob Barker. Sandler yells a lot. That's about it.

The Wedding Singer: Here Sandler plays a wedding singer who is left at the altar so he can fall in love with Drew Barrymore. This is the best detail–oriented of all the Sandler movies. You can just pay attention to the background, the costuming, the soundtrack and Sandler's small–dead–mammal haircut and be thoroughly entertained.

Sandler shows his softer, romantic side here, turning himself from the world's brattiest man into the world's dorkiest man. Best moment: Sandler's rendition of "Love Stinks" dedicated to his dork brethren, the "mutants at table nine." I know what it is like to sit at table nine. Sing on, brother.

Mixed Nuts: Sandler plays the small but important part of a weird troubadour in this Steve Martin farce. Sandler's ukelele numbers are priceless and his incorporation of farting noises into "Jingle Bells" is pure genius. Best moment: To the tune of "Deck the Halls": "We could really use your business/ doobie–doobie–do, let's eat Cheez–Its."

Billy Madison: This is the movie that made Adam Sandler a star. Most of the guys I grew up with can quote whole sections of this film with frightening accuracy. Sandler plays Billy, a rich twit who decides to go back to school, from first grade to 12th, to prove that he is capable of running the family business. From the first scenes of Sandler drawing on his chest with suntan lotion, to the last scenes of Chris Farley kissing a giant penguin, Billy Madison is stuffed with tiny, memorable gags, plays on words, and nonsensical bits of dialogue. Who needs a smart, chatty comedy when you can watch Sandler dance down a staircase to the music in his head? Best moment: There are too many to choose from. My personal favorite is the dramatization of the epic battle between shampoo and conditioner.

So, will Sandler continue his crabby toddler routine or will he eventually tone his act down for more mainstream pictures, like the dull comedy–"drama" Bulletproof? Here's hoping that he never stops leaving flaming bags of dog poop on the front steps of Hollywood.

Dave Brubeck shines at the Calvin theater

DAVE BRUBECK QUARTET
Calvin Theater
Oct. 7

Opening the Calvin with both style and substance, the Dave Brubeck Quartet kept the Northampton crowd mesmerized on Wednesday night.

Playing mostly songs from their latest album, So What's New, but also diving into some new, unrecorded material, the group was the perfect solution to all the pre–concert hype of the theater's reopening.

Before sitting down to his piano, the seventy–something Brubeck introduced every song with an anecdote that managed to keep the crowd in stitches, and enhanced the celebratory mood of the evening.

The group opened with "Runaway Bossanova," a song that really moved, and featured a rapid–fingering that blew the roof off the place, flute–wielding Bobby Militello. It was a great start for the new era of the Calvin, as both Militello and Brubeck soared with their solos, and the rhythm section of bassist Alec Dankworth and drummer Randy Jones kept things quick and furious.

"Three Get Ready And Four To Go" stayed in the Brubeck tradition by avoiding a standard time signature; the song began as a waltz and then changed to a sparse and low key bit of music which then allowed Militello to go nuts on the alto sax.

Brubeck exhibited his skills best on the faster–than–usual waltz, "Waltzing," which he jokingly said he wrote as a favor to the Viennese while he was in Vienna. His piano–playing was both hard–hitting and wild, but also seemingly executed with ease.

The first set ended with a tribute to the eighty–year–old pianist of National Public Radio fame, "Marian McPartlan" was a swinging tribute.

After intermission, the quartet got edgier, playing mostly unreleased or unrecorded stuff that sounded a lot like 70's fusion.

"Schilling," a track to be recorded when the group arrives in England next month, was an endless labyrinth of a song, while "The Basey Band Is Back In Town" closed out the scheduled performance with a flourish. Randy Jones went absolutely berserk on the drums to end things with an eruption of percussion.

The band exited to a standing ovation, but then returned to take a bow and return for a scorching encore.

Calvin Theater to reopen artistic doors

On Wednesday night, with over 1,400 people in attendance, the restored Calvin Theater opened its doors to a warm reception from the Northampton community.

Eric Suher, the Northampton entrepreneur responsible for the Calvin's reopening, and Northampton Mayor Mary L. Ford, cut the ribbon as state politicians, building contractors, and community members alike expressed their approval with applause and jubilation.

"It's a wonderful gift to this community," the mayor said. "There's many a good tune played on an old fiddle."

The mayor also noted that Northampton has been voted the best small arts city in the country, and praised the Calvin's reopening as

THE IMPOSSIBLE WORLD
Combustible Edison
Sub-Pop

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Just in time to cap off the swing revival, Combustible Edison's new release, The Impossible World, proves that the veterans of lounge melodica are still kicking and perhaps could even teach a thing or two to all those new "Big Daddy" bands.

According to the band, "[the] Impossible World is a rich and strange place that exists in a future and a past that never were and might never be...but it's happening NOW, baby! It's a kinky, colorful odyssey through a universe of poignant yearning, deviant eroticism and droll humor, guided by the seductive, psychoactive powers of pure sound."

The "rich and strange place" that Impossible World took me to was a posh hotel in some far off exotic location. Miss Lily Banquette greets me in the lobby, slipping a kitsch lei over my neck and a cocktail in my hand, welcoming me to "Utopia." I am then led to an elevator filled with some vibrant hypnotica. The nice elevator man lets me off on the top floor and I stumble into a space-age lounge where members of the Cocktail Nation twirl and dip around me in all their fedora-and-feather glory. The Millionaire winks at me as the band strikes up a tune more "suave and suburbik" sounds...

It's like a York Peppermint Patty musical sensation.

Some Com Ed fans may feel like they've been on this trip before, namely with Tim Roth as bellhop. But this time keyboardist Brother Cleve and percussion "dynamo" Michael "Laughing Boy" Connors have joined original band members Nicholas Cudahy, Miss Lily, and the Millionaire.

There's also a very noticeable new electronic beat and experimental sound due to the addition of Producer/Engineer John Holbrook and "the man known only as Scanner."

The band writes, "He served as Dubmaster-General on this project, performing acts of transformative musical terrorism on the unsuspecting songs; changing their specific density, altering their duration, amplitude, latitude, attitude; de- contextualizing, re-texturalizing, mangling, messaging, and metamorphosing the sonic source material...and sometimes just leaving it alone."

Besides these funky new additions, there are still traces of classic Com Ed fun. Track four will bring you back to the lounge where "The Tiki Wonder Hour" debuted and audiences clamored for more L Swinger. Miss Lily seduces you on track six and summons you to her room on track 11. The final track, the "Utopia" reprise, is like the morning after – it brings a close to your stay by welcoming you into an ethereal subconsciousness.

The Impossible World is a great addition to any Com Ed fan's collection and a good introduction to those hipsters just entering the swing scene. It's also terrific mood music for your next cocktail party. "For those of you who understand that a world of High Style and Smooth Sounds need not exist solely in the past," go out and get The Impossible World. A- helping to maintain that status.

The Calvin, named for Northampton native and U.S. President Calvin Coolidge, first opened in 1924 under the management of the Goldstein Amusement Company as the premier area attraction for catching double feature, first-run films. After 70 years of entertaining the community, the theater closed in 1994 due to water damage.

Suher, currently the owner of both the Iron Horse Music Hall and Pearl Street Night Club, purchased the Calvin last year from Ronald Goldstein, whose family had owned the venue since its opening.

After receiving citations from the state legislature for his contributions to the community, Suher recalled the eight- month project to bring the Calvin back to its former glory. He thanked the contractors who had done the job, his staff at all the nightclubs, his family, the Goldstein family, everyone in attendance, and the community for "really carrying the project."

Dave-in-the-morning from 100.9 WRNX hosted the event, delivering both a history lesson of the theater along with a bit of a stand-up comedy routine. Using the Calvin's timeline, he got behind a piano to parody Sinatra's, "It Was A Very Good Year," before introducing the Dave Brubeck Quartet.

UMass hockey squad set; season opener tonight

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

After finishing last season with a disappointing 6-24-3 mark, the Massachusetts hockey team will look to turn over a new leaf starting tonight, when it opens up the 1998-99 season with an exhibition game against Concordia.

The Minutemen lost a large group of seniors, and will be primarily a young squad this season. In fact, three-quarters of the team will be comprised of freshmen and sophomores.

UMass will play arguably the toughest schedule it has composed since the program was reinstated back in 1993. In addition to a full slate of conference action in Hockey East, the Minutemen will also play the likes of Michigan State, Harvard, Colorado College, Air Force, and Western Michigan.

This year's team will be captained by junior defenseman Dean Stork. Junior forward Jeff Blanchard and senior Bryan Fitzgerald will serve as the assistants.

The Minutemen will open up regular season play on Saturday, Oct. 17, when they travel to East Lansing, Mich. to face MSU. The home opener is Oct. 22 versus UMass- Lowell.

Remember to be on the lookout for the UMass Hockey Preview Issue that is slated to come out in the Collegian at the end of the month.

UMass water polo seeks win

By Alexander Wood
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's water polo team will be back in the pool trying to extend their nine game winning streak as they face Iona, Queens, the United States Merchant Marines Academy and Lehman College in this weekend's CWPA League Tournament.

The Minutemen will be working on their undefeated streak without leading scorer senior Brian Stahl, who was injured in last weekend's competition against Queens.

"His lip's still cut up and he doesn't have the stitches out, so he's obviously not ready to play this weekend," coach Russ Yarworth said.

Meanwhile, senior Aldo Roman, also injured in the Queens game, is doubtful at best for the upcoming tournament.

While Stahl and Roman will be sidelined with injuries, UMass is getting some good news in that they will be getting back several players who have just recovered from injury.

Senior Chad Filiault, junior Cory Koenemann and freshman Carlos Ramos will all return to the lineup for this weekend's CWPA action.

"We've just come through an injury rash which I can usually deal with, but when they [injuries] come from brutality I tend to get a little upset," Yarworth said.

As of now, there has been no disciplinary action taken towards last weekend's game in which Queens players attacked Stahl and Roman. The league officers decided that it was out of their jurisdiction because it was a non-league game. The issue has been taken up by the UMass and Queens College athletic directors, who have yet to rule on the matter.

"I don't know what they are going to decide," commented Yarworth.

UMass will head into the tournament with commanding records against this weekend's opposition. The Minutemen are 13-6 all time against Iona, including a 23-13 drubbing back on Septemher 13 in Amherst.

The Merchant Marines and Lehman College will be diving into the pool, looking for their first-ever wins against UMass, as both teams will bring 0-5 and 0-2 records respectively against our Minutemen, into this weekend's action.

"Iona is a good, tough club. They're someone we've got to be aware of. The other two teams [Merchant Marines and Lehman College] are good, developing programs," said Yarworth.

Meanwhile, Queens has managed to split a pair of games against UMass this season, leaving the series record at 16-6 for the Minutemen.

"My team will go in and play the brand of water polo that we are known for playing, which is championship caliber, aggressive water polo," Yarworth said.

With their 12-1 record and the season dwindling down rapidly, UMass is beginning to gear up for the Eastern Championship.

"Our goal is to win the Eastern Championship and then go to Nationals," Yarworth said.

Women's tennis to face-off UConn

By Jenn Gaylord
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team has had some pretty difficult teams to compete against in the past few weeks, but their match tomorrow at noon doesn't look to be one of them.

The Minutewomen will travel to Storrs, CT to take on border rival Connecticut. This match looks to be a good one for the Minutewomen who have an overall season record of 1-2, while the Huskies come into the match having a season record of 0-6 this year.

This may be the easiest match of the season for the Minutewomen. They go into Connecticut to face a UConn women's tennis program that has been on the decline for the last few years. On the other hand, the UMass program has been steadily improving in that same amount of time.

Therefore, it's not that hard to see why the Minutewomen are favored to win the match.

Tomorrow's match should also be good because it will be UMass junior Michelle Khur's first chance to play. She has been hit by a string of bad luck in past years and this will be her first match as she plays in the number six singles match.

UMass tennis coach Judy Dixon, will be sitting out her number two singles player, senior co-captain Jackie Braunstein.

When asked about her thoughts on what tomorrow's match should bring, Dixon had the following comments: "I hope that we will not get sloppy, and that we'll play with a lot of grit, determination, and intensity," she said.

The team has had some pretty good practices since their win last Saturday against the Red Storm of St. John's University.

The UMass doubles pairings have changed a bit from their previous matches. These changes should improve the team's chances of winning. The number one doubles pairing goes to freshman Helena Horak and junior Ola Gerasimova. The number two duo goes to freshman Annie Hamilton and freshman Ali Tross. The number three doubles tandem will go to senior co-captain Gillian Kane and sophomore Robyn Lebovitz.

In last year's match against the Huskies, the Minutewomen came away with a victory by a score of 7-0.

Dixon also hopes that this match will be a good preparation for when the team goes on the road next weekend for a few of their biggest matches of the season.

They will face off against Temple University on the 17th and La Salle and Georgetown in Philadelphia, Penn, on the 18th.

Minutewomen Notes: The match against the Huskies will be a seven point match as opposed to the nine point match that is usually played. This means that winning all three doubles matches will sield one point instead of the usual three. Each singles match that it won will give only one point...Looking ahead, UMass will next take to the court after next weekend's matches on Oct. 24 and 25 when they face Columbia, Army and Air Force.

Men's tennis to be tested three times this weekend

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis season has gone as expected so far: two matches, and two wins. With two convincing home victories thus far, the team now must face three tough road opponents in a matter of four days.

Earlier in the season these matches were highlighted as keys to the season. UMass tennis head coach Judy Dixon has said that she will have no trouble getting her team motivated to play against them.

The first match today pits the Minutemen against the Eagles of Boston College. Last year the team was able to beat BC 4-2, but that win came in the comforts of home on the upper Boyden courts.

The next task for the Maroon and White will be the University of Connecticut. The Huskies are undefeated this season with dominating victories of 7-0, 7-0, 6-1, and 6-1. The UConn team features two freshman twins in Sean and Jason Palleschi, that were not on the team last year when the Minutemen narrowly escaped with a 4-3 victory.

To conclude the road trip, the Minutemen will return to Boston to face Boston University. Last year the Terriers downed the Minutemen 4-3. This year Dixon feels that she will be bringing a much more talented team up against her New England rivals.

"We feel we are a force to be reckoned with in the east," Dixon said. "This is the most talented team I've coached since I've been here. This team has the most depth."

This weekend UMass will have a chance to prove its coach right. All three of these teams are very strong opponents and will put Massachusetts' undefeated record to the test.

"In order for UMass to win we must win at the four through six seeds," Dixon said. "I think it is good that we have the week off to practice. I have planned some challenge matches to prepare."

The Minutemen hope to continue their clutch play, which has earned them victories over the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the University of Vermont. In particular, the team hopes for the continued success of number one singles seed, junior Roh Manchester and number three seed Fabian Rubanal.

"I am glad for Rob Manchester," Dixon said. "This win [over UVM] puts him back on track. The only way to get confidence is to win."

The entire Minutemen squad is looking to build on the confidence that their first two home matches have provided them. They will need it if they are to prove victorious over BC, UConn, and BU.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — There is a great deal for you to accomplish at this time, but you may have to take a side-trip in order to come to the aid of a friend today.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — There is a great deal of potential to be explored when it comes to a new relationship. Today, certain answers will surprise and inspire you.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — External influences may be formidable at this time, but you can demonstrate your inner strength by dealing with all that you face.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Do you want to tell the truth today, or tell people only what they want to hear? There is more value in facing what is real every time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — It's important to deal with issues that directly affect you and those around you at this time. You can promote a very special kind of healing.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — There are dangers facing you at this time, but you know how to focus on the positive rather than on any potential negatives.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may be trying to do things on your own at this time, but the fact is that you may not be able to escape the limitations others have set.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Personal affairs may confuse you at this time, but only insofar as they relate to your professional inspirations. Strive for balance in all things.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Focus on what you are saying and why you are saying it. You want to have your mind and spirit in complete accord at this time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Double- and triple- check all the things you have to balance today. Once you receive the "go ahead" for a new project, you'll begin with remarkable facility.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Pay particular attention to details today, and you may realize that you're not yet prepared for what is in store. You've left one thing out.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Strength and peace of mind are a result of a firm belief in what you are doing– and why. You'll enjoy the support of a wide variety of people.

ASU in a heap of trouble; 'Cuse gets the cupcake

The Pac–10 has been accused of being soft. Wide open style, surfboard in arm, bombshell in other, it's the left coast's way of saying "we're not cold."

But that hasn't gotten anyone anywhere in years past. Fitting the bill for that hex is Arizona State, who, in the blistering sun of Tempe, lies at 2–3, searching desperately for a win going into this weekend's clash with the ladies from South Bend, pal.

Maybe the Germaine to Boston call in the Rose Bowl is still ringing in the ears of Sun Devils' coach Bruce Snyder. So close yet so far away, right?

Brett Mauser
football

Tempe was crowning sophomore Ryan Kealy as the heir to the throne after Jake Plummer's run in town. Kealy was back after a stellar frosh campaign to head an offensive unit that returned nine starters. Instead, State is backpeddling to a winter break where those dreams of footballs dancing in their heads might actually be boring old sugarplums.

Here's the situation for Snyder and the boys: With six wins being the minimum to gain a Bowl bid, the easiest route would be to beat the Irish, and then Stanford, Washington State, and California.

There, that's six, you're in with that schedule, Bruce.

A loss in any of those games forces the Sun Devils to go on the road in their final two games to knock off the red–hot Pac–10 tandem of Oregon and Arizona.

After having let up 22 fourth quarter points to USC in last week's 35–24 loss, Arizona State's heads can't be too high. For three quarters, State held the Trojans in check, but late in the game. Then, in the fourth quarter, one could only watch from the sidelines as, with a 24–21 lead, the offense handed out 14 points to the Trojan defense via interception and punt block, deep in Sun Devil territory.

Another letdown would seemingly knock the Devils out of contention for a Bowl. Notre Dame is in the hunt for its first road win after embarrassing themselves in East Lansing with a 45–25 loss to Michigan State.

The variable is the ASU run defense. Against the rush in the last two games, the Sun Devils have yielded only 32 yards total on 51 carries from Oregon State and USC. Tomorrow they face arguably the best back they will see all year in Autry Denson. Honorable mention variable: Kealy, does he go or no?

Come Sunday, we'll know a lot about the path each of these teams has chosen for the '98 campaign. I like ASU to take this pup. It's showtime for the Sun Devils. Or that remote control's going to require new batteries come January. Arizona State 26, Notre Dame 17.

Mauser's Toilet Bowl Picks of the Week:

Last week: 2–1
Season: 6–3
What a pass by Kidd.

Oh, whoops. my fault, I was just thinking Cal and, well, y'know...

Who the heck are these guys and what business do they have thinking Top 25? A win over USC tomorrow might give them the key.

The Golden Bears are not used to this kind of thing. With a 3–1 record entering Memorial Stadium, the Bears are on the map thanks to a defense that is holding opponents to 15 points per contest.

Flip the coin and there's that offense. Ouch. Coach Tom Holmoe knows that his offense isn't going to win the ballgame for the Bears. Not against the Pac–10's stingiest defense. Uh uh, don't think so.

USC quarterback Mike Van Raaphorst has his work cut out for him. The Trojans are atop the division, but Van Raaphorst has completed only 45–percent of his passes and now does battle with the conference's best pass defense, which has notched eight interceptions through four games. His weaknesses were exposed in the 30–10 loss to Florida State, when he and backup John Fox combined for 23 yards through the air.

Granted, Cal is not FSU, but Holmoe's attitude is to slow the pace of the game. That was evident in the 24–3 loss to Nebraska. We will see more of that this weekend. I'll take the Golden Bears over the Trojans with a free 12 1/2 points.

• On the undercard, I'll go against LSU for a second straight week, taking Florida at home, giving up 12 1/2 freebies. And in the Carrier Dome, Cincinnati's in trouble. Syracuse is coming off a loss on national television to N.C. State and now returns home to go up against the nation's worst defense. Giving up 42 1/2 big ones, gimme the Orangemen.

Mercy rule? Heh heh...I don't think so.

No. 24 Minutemen ready to host Dukes

Downtrodden James Madison team set to invade McGuirk

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

When Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple came to Amherst, we knew he was good. But this good?

A month into the 1998 gridiron season, UMass has been hit by a whirlwind of amazing measures and now are ranked 24th in all of I–AA football. This weekend, James Madison University will try to send them back a step.

Coming off a 40–35 upset of No. 5 Hofstra in Hempstead, NY last Saturday, the Minutemen prepare for tomorrow's home battle with the Dukes, a team that brings a different style of football to the table.

Last year, JMU upended the Minutemen 13–10 in Harrisonburg, VA. The loss was the third of six consecutive losses to start UMass' 1997 season.

This time around, though, it is the Dukes that are reeling. James Madison comes in at 1–4 on the year, but have faced some of the stiffest competition around, including I–A's Maryland Terrapins in a game they lost 23–15, while holding the Terps to 222 total yards.

The Minutemen, on the other hand, have won three straight to turn some heads with a 3–1 record, with the only loss having come to No. 5 Delaware.

"We just have to worry about this week," Whipple said. "I think it's nice for the players to get the recognition they deserve. Where we stand is going to be how we're going to play [tomorrow]."

Quarterback Todd Bankhead ranks third in the country and first in the Atlantic 10 in total offense and heads into tomorrow's game fresh off a 345–yard, three touchdown performance. Last week, he became the first QB in UMass history to compile 1,000 passing yards through four games.

"The numbers are nice, but I think Todd really proved what tremendous character he has and confidence in his own abilities," Whipple said, "because he played awful in the first half. He just came out in the second half and did a great job leading the football team down the field."

Bankhead could have trouble with the JMU secondary, though, as the Dukes' backfield comes in as the second–rated pass defense in the conference, giving up only 197 yards per contest. Many of the accolades for their prominence is due to senior free safety Tony Boutin, who was named Division I–AA's defensive player of the year in the Sporting News' preseason football issue. Booth leads the team in tackles with 47, but has yet to record a pick.

On the flipside, JMU's offense has staggered to a last place finish in scoring offense going into this weekend. They average 19 points and, save a 30–point output against Villanova, the Dukes have yet to eclipse the 15–point mark in five games.

"They're wounded," Whipple said, "but they're going to come up here and I don't have any doubt at all that they're going to play their best game of the year."

UMass could be without both co–captain Khari Samuel and Compton Webster for tomorrow's game. Samuel is listed as questionable to return from a right thigh contusion that he suffered in the victory over Buffalo. Webster, who spelled Samuel at middle linebacker in beating Hofstra, went down with a sprained right ankle and is doubtful.

The Dukes will throw a one–back set at the Minutemen which puts much of the pressure on tailback Curtis Keaton. The transfer from West Virginia has rambled for 538 yards and three touchdowns this year.

Minutemen Notes: Tomorrow's matchup with the Dukes will also be Band Day at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium...The Minutemen will next be in action next Saturday afternoon when they will travel to Storrs, CT to face the Huskies.

Minutewomen to host Colonials, Hokies in a pair of A–10 contests

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

One plus one equals two.

It's a simple equation, but one that the Massachusetts women's soccer team couldn't acknowledge until a 3–1 win over Rhode Island on Tuesday night in Kingston, RI. The victory over the Rams combined with last Sunday's 2–1 double–overtime win over St. Joseph's marked the first time all season UMass had put together a winning streak of more than one game.

Now the Minutewomen (5–7, 2–1 in the Atlantic 10) will look to string together wins three and four this weekend, when they host George Washington and Virginia Tech in a pair of conference match–ups.

"I'm hoping that the players take it that way [the winning streak as a step in the right direction]," UMass women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "They sent two kids to the hospital in the Fordham game."

Leading the way for GW will be senior Jane Lea, who heads the team with 13 points. Other notables Rudy pointed out included sophomore Lauren Papalia and senior forward Jane Andersen.

Virginia Tech, who will put in an appearance at Totman on Sunday at 1 p.m., arrives in Amherst with a 6–4–1 mark, 2–1 in the A–10.

"Virginia Tech is off to their best start in recent years," Rudy said. "Both of these teams are ones that could bump us out for a spot in the A–10's [tournament]. We have to be focused, especially because we already dropped the Temple game and still have to go to Ohio to play Dayton and Xavier."

The offensive situation once again remains the same for UMass. Senior co–captain Sophie Lecot, junior Emma Kurowski, and sophomore Kara Green continue to be the three leading scorers for the Minutewomen.

Rudy will have one final decision to make regarding his starting goalkeeper. Junior Angie Napoli and freshman Cori Stevens are both coming off strong outings.

"Most likely we'll go with Cori on Friday and Angie on Sunday," he said.

Men's soccer heads south for a pair

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

This weekend will be a gut check for the Massachusetts men's soccer team as they head south to face two conference opponents in George Washington today, and Virginia Tech on Sunday.

Last weekend, the Minutemen dropped two games in a similar Friday/Sunday format to the less formidable combination of Temple and St. Joseph's.

The 6–1 humiliating loss at St. Joe's left the Minutemen at 0–8–2 on the year heading into this weekend's contests.

"These games mean too much to us for us to dwell on last weekend," Massachusetts coach Sam Koch said. "We must move on, and get this season heading in the right direction."

UMass will try to seize their first victory against the Colonials of George Washington, who currently possess an unimpressive 1–7–3 record (0–1–2 in the A–10) The lone GW win came on their initial game this season, a 3–1 triumph over Howard.

The Colonials will look toward their offensive weapons in Ben Hatton, Jason Holloway, and Evan Nierman as they will look to keep the Minutemen winless.

Hatton, Holloway, and Nierman are currently tied with 6 points (three goals apiece) for the Colonial scoring lead.

While the teams are evenly matched on paper, the Minutemen will have to contend with the raucous crowd that has been filling the 5,000 seat South Riding Field since its opening three seasons ago.

The Hokies will be one of the tougher divisional opponents UMass will have seen thus far. They sport a 4–6–1 record (1–1–1 in the A–10).

Tech is fresh off a conference win last Sunday at Fordham, a game in which they were victorio us by a count of 2–1.

Offensively, Tech senior Stanislav Licul will be the player to watch, as he has lit up opponents all season. Licul leads the Hokies squad with five goals and one assist for eleven points.

Senior Matt Whallen has chipped in with three goals and two assists for eight points, while Ryan Cummins has added four points on the season.

UMass will look to counter against these teams by incorporating some new faces in the lineup.

"We have been looking forward to the return of Johnny Bibb and hoping to get J.R. Pouncey involved as well," Koch said. "Those guys will certainly contribute to this team in the near future."

Pouncey, a sophomore transfer from Texas A&M, saw some action in the St. Joe's game last Sunday, and figures to be an integral part of the attack down the road.

This weekend will prove to be critical in their attempt to make some noise in the Atlantic 10 picture. A pair of wins could be essential if the Minutemen still hold hopes of competing for the conference crown.

Spikers hit the road to face the Bonnies

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Although it may only have an overall record of 7–9, the most important thing right now for the Massachusetts women's volleyball team is that it has posted a 4–3 Atlantic 10 mark through the first seven conference games.

The Minutewomen seemed to have finally gotten over the hump when they beat both George Washington and Fordham last weekend, both in five games. The pair of wins vaulted UMass right back with a 4–2 into the conference title chase.

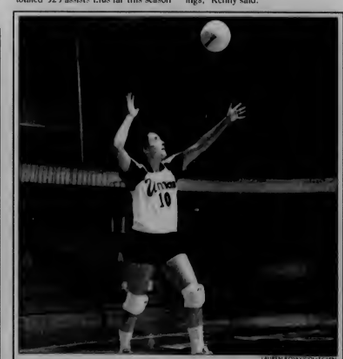
However, on Wednesday night, the Minutewomen fell to 4–3 with a 3–1 loss to Rhode Island.

"After taking those two huge steps forward last weekend, we took a big step backwards by losing to URI. We just didn't play well," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said.

The Minutewomen hope to rebound quickly this weekend as they take to the court against A–10 rival St. Bonaventure. For UMass, this is their last road match for a while and they hope to end a recent 2–1 road trip with a win against the Bonnies.

The Bonnies head into their date with UMass sporting a 2– 12 overall record, and winless in the A–10 (0–6). The struggling Bonnies will look to kills leaders Julie Gallagher, Caroline Keenan and Erin Myers, as well as Shannon Bowen, who leads the Bonnies with 110 digs, in order to win this match. UMass also needs to watch for setter Tracy Bryniarski, who has totaled 323 assists thus far this season along with 73 defensive digs.

"They're [St. Bonaventure] not a very big team. We should be able to dominate them at the net, but it's a tough place to play, and we can't afford to take them lightly," Kenny said. "We're not that good yet, but we will be prepared."



The Minutewomen will need to be prepared in order to defeat the Bonnies. UMass entered the match against URI prepared, but didn't execute. This is a reminder of earlier in the season, when the Minutewomen struggled to execute their game plan.

The Minutewomen committed 37 hitting errors against URI and 17 service errors. UMass missed eight serves on 11 rotations, in pivotal game three.

"We should have been able to win game three despite the fact that we weren't playing well. We played poorly and still had a chance to win," Kenny said. "I was just disappointed with the team's lack of enthusiasm."

The Minutewomen will need steady performances from players like Heather Holtsberg and Rebecca Hasson in order for UMass to get back on the winning track. Hasson is consistent on the attack, having tallied 131 digs and 111 kills. Junior co–captains Kari Hogancamp and Jill Meyers have also been a steady force for UMass. Hogancamp has totaled 245 kills for the season, while Meyers' 55 kill performance last weekend brings her to 1,090 career kills, which is third all time at UMass.

"I just hope that they're still thinking about how they played against URI, and maybe look to those feelings," Kenny said.

AIDS epidemic ravages small African country

CHIPHWANYA, Malawi (AP) — The cemetery is nearly full in this village of several thousand people on the parched savannah of central Malawi. Just about every day there is a funeral.

Villagers know that AIDS is feeding the burial ground, but they can do little. There is no testing, not much government aid, and the nearest clinic is 12 miles away over rutted dirt roads. This south-central African country is so poor, and the AIDS epidemic so bad, the government can't do much more than ask villages to help themselves.

A network of village committees was set up several years ago, but quickly fell moribund for lack of direction.

In stepped Save the Children with financing from the U.S. Agency for International Development. The organization set up a program to train villagers in caring for the sick at home, tending to the many children orphaned by AIDS and educating young people to avoid infection.

About 150 such committees have been formed in Malawi's thousands of villages. It is the kind of local, volunteer-based effort that typifies the attempt to grapple with the AIDS epidemic ravaging southern Africa.

Wyo. student killed in homophobic attack

LARAMIE, Wyo. (AP) — A gay college student who was lured from a campus hangout, beaten and lashed to a split-rail fence died last Tuesday, and the two young men arrested in the attack now face murder charges that could bring the death penalty.

Matthew Shepard, 21, died at Poudre Valley Hospital in Fort Collins, Colo., while on life support. His skull was so badly smashed that doctors could not perform surgery, hospital president Rulon Stacey said.

The University of Wyoming student had been in a coma since bicyclists found him in near-freezing temperatures Wednesday evening. They at first mistook him for a scarecrow.

The attack has spurred calls nationwide for hate-crimes legislation protecting gays. President Clinton pressed Congress to expand the federal hate-crimes law to cover offenses based on disability or sexual orientation.

"Americans will once again search their hearts and do what they can to reduce their own fear and anxiety and ignorance of people who are different," Clinton said. "And I hope that Congress will pass the hate-crime legislation."

Russell Arthur Henderson, 21, and Aaron James McKinney, 22, were originally charged with attempted murder, kidnapping and aggravated robbery, and jailed on $100,000 bail each.

"Power and Class" honored as best in nation

The UMass Minuteman Marching Band received the Louis C. Sudler trophy Saturday during "Band Day."

COURTESY ERIC POSNER

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

More than 320 music students and a director, together nationally known as, "The Power and Class of New England," now know what it's like to win the "Heisman Trophy" of university marching bands.

On Saturday Oct. 10, at the McGuirk Alumni Stadium, the University of Massachusetts Minutemen Marching Band received the 1998 Louis C. Sudler Trophy Award.

"The whole reason I came to UMass was to just be in this band because I knew this was the best band in the nation, and now this award proves it," said Rick Binder, a junior band member.

The Marching Band was honored in front of more than 80 high school bands with a total of more than 14,000 people in attendance.

The award is given out annually to recognize college and university marching bands that have displayed excellence in musical standards and in creating innovative marching techniques towards improving the performance standards of marching bands.

The John Philips Sousa Foundation administers the annual presentation to the honored university marching band, during a home football game.

The awarded band is chosen by a panel of jury members from across the country who feel the band has shown a tradition of excellence over the years.

Only 16 other universities have previously been honored with the award.

Band member Andrea deGroff felt honored to be there.

"It's a great honor and very exciting to think that we'll be in the band hall–of–fame," deGroff said.

The trophy was awarded to the band in the presence of UMass President William Bulger and Colonel John Bourgeois, the President of the John Philips Sousa Foundation and the former director of the "President's Own Marine Band," which plays for President Clinton.

"The band exhibits a great deal in practice, dedication, and in maintaining a great spirit, which adds a lot to the atmosphere of the college," Bourgeois said. "What impresses me most is that a whole ensemble is awarded for its performance instead of only acknowledging good work on an individual basis."

Plaques were also given out to the past and present band directors and faculty that over the years have made an impact on where the band is today.

Joseph Contino, the Minuteman Marching Band director from 1950–1963 was pleased with the accomplishments of the band as a whole.

"I think it's a tribute to the improvement of the band to this level of excellence in both sound and spectacle," Contino said. "The students go out and rehearse like crazy to which they don't get very much tangible credit and this award is something they've really deserved."

Sophomore marching band percussionist Dan Albert feels the award is a great honor to be shared by many.

"It's a tribute to the band and the whole University," Albert said. "For us, the feeling is like winning the Final Four Tournament for a basketball team."

The theme for "Band Day" arrangements was "Titanic" and the song "My Heart Will Go On," by Celine Dion.

The half–time show arrangements consisted of the band performing along with the 80 nationwide high school bands.

The difficulty of the choreography of the band's movement didn't seem to hamper the playing style or the spirit that the band brought upon many of the spectators.

In fact, for freshmen marching band members Kristy Steeves and Sarah Keim, the spirit went beyond the day's events.

"Playing a part in the trumpet section is the only way to go, and it's one great experience," Steeves said.

Band director George Parks expressed his gratitude for all the contributing forces that helped make the award possible. "We have great respect for the contributions of all our athletic teams, and we're happy to be a part of that and contribute to the great quality that is going on there," Parks said. "I'm just so proud in all the whole band and the contributions of the alumni who came back, for all of them really made the program what it really is."

Traveling across the nation and being involved in many events, Parks expressed his respect and praise for the dedication of his students.

"These kids will sleep on gym floors, eat stale donuts, and do anything they can to make a great band," Parks said. "These are the most dedicated and most committed students anyone could ask for."

During the post–game show, the band played more selections including music from "West Side Story." Thousands of spectators stayed to watch.

"What you are about to see is something that we'd like to call a victory lap," Parks said. As for the days events Parks felt they had accomplished just that.

Cellucci, Harshbarger to debate

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Nov. 3, 1998 is the date when Massachusetts statewide elections will be held. This year, there is an added level of excitement due to the gubernatorial race.

The candidates are Republican acting Gov. Paul Cellucci and Democrat State Attorney General Scott Harshbarger.

On Wednesday, Oct. 14 the two candidates will debate various issues in the second of three televised debates, at 8 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

The candidates will be addressing several issues including education, tax cuts, crime, economic development and school safety.

If the debate at the Mullins Center is similar to previous ones mud slinging will be at the forefront. In the first debate at the Lowell Memorial Auditorium, both candidates failed to focus on the issues as much as on personal attacks.

Cellucci focused on Harshbarger's failure to sign "the no new taxes pledge." Acting Gov. Cellucci asked several times "why won't you sign the no new taxes pledge, right here, right now?" Then Cellucci said Harshbarger was a financial risk for Massachusetts.

Harshbarger responded by attacking Cellucci's flip flop stances on the death penalty and minimum wage increase.

"You have gone back and forth on this when it suits your political purposes," Harshbarger said.

Cellucci proceeded to call Harshbarger a Michael Dukakis clone. Dukakis, governor of Massachusetts in the '80s, has been blamed for the fall of the Massachusetts economy at the end of that decade.

"Your first impulse is always to spend money. My first impulse is to cut taxes for the families of this state," Cellucci said.

Harshbarger retorted by telling the audience in Lowell, and those who were watching on television, that Cellucci needed to stop riding on the coattails of former Gov. Bill Weld's record.

"I'm not Mike Dukakis and Paul, as we all know, you're not Bill Weld," Harshbarger said.

Finger pointing aside, each candidate is bringing a substantive platform into the second debate.

The Cellucci agenda on the afore mentioned issues includes cutting the state income tax from 5.95 percent to 5 percent, which will save the average family $600 a year.

Harshbarger is targeting tax relief for everyone, but in particular, working families earning $75,000 or less.

He is proposing a permanent tax exemption on the first $1,000 of dividend and interest income, as well as cutting the earned income tax rate to 5.25 percent over a five year period.

"In the last debate Cellucci wanted to bring out the differences in the candidates, talking mainly about death and taxes, but as democrats, what we care about is the sick, young, the unemployed and education. There is more to life than death and taxes," said Toby Chaudhuri, president of the Massachusetts College Democrats and spokesperson for Harshbarger.

On education, the Cellucci plan is to hire 4,000 new teachers and to mandate that 90 percent of all new allocated education money is spent in the classroom. Cellucci also plans to give teachers competency tests. In addition Cellucci has added an additional $8 million for scholarships at state colleges and universities.

"What Gov. Cellucci is referring to when he talks about 90 percent of new money, is to put this money towards textbooks, computers and also teachers, not into administrative costs," said Shawn Feedeman, a spokesperson for the Cellucci campaign. "Gov. Cellucci also wants to hire 4,000 new teachers and give competency tests to existing teachers in order to reduce class size and give Massachusetts students the best education."

Harshbarger's position on education talks specifically about attracting students who are training to become teachers. It calls for $1.8 million to go to college students studying to become educators and aggressively marketing the program to prospective teachers.

"This is a pro–active preventive resolution to bolster the training of teachers and make sure that we have teachers who are trained properly, and not just tested," Chaudhuri said.

Cellucci's big push against crime is to restore the death penalty to Massachusetts. He has also proposed tougher mandatory minimum sentences for those who are convicted of domestic violence.

Harshbarger's stance on domestic violence includes establishing the crime of stalking, and classifying it as a felony, as well as requiring batterers to surrender firearms and permits to own firearms.

On economic development, Cellucci signed a bill cutting the Unemployment Insurance Rate, saving Massachusetts companies nearly $200 million per year, which can be used to create jobs.

"This will pump up the economy, create more jobs and allows our economy to be competitive," Feedeman said. "Our unemployment is 3 percent, a whole 1.5 percent below the national average."

Harshbarger said that in order to create new business, the state's community colleges need to be turned into training grounds to educate workers for business. Harshbarger also said the focus

Educational television to showcase writing of faculty and local authors in series

By Jason Kadish
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts Educational Television will air new episodes of "Fine Print" featuring local writers, beginning Oct. 14.

Each half–hour episode of "Fine Print" takes a look at writers, writing, and the creative process. Featured writers include: Agha Shadid Ali, Noy Holland, Jay Neugeboren, James Tate, John Wideman, and Dara Wier.

Ali, Tate, and Wideman are currently UMass faculty members.

Ali is the director of the Masters of Fine Arts Program in Creative Writing. His last volume of verse, The Country Without A Post Office, was published in 1997. In 1991, Ali translated The Rebel's Silhouette by famous Urdu poet Faiz Ahmed Faiz.

Tate taught at the University of California at Berkeley and at Columbia University before coming to UMass in 1971. Tate's Selected Poems (1991) was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in Poetry, The William Carlos Williams Award, and the National Book award.

Wideman's novels Sent For You Yesterday and Philadelphia Fire received P.E.N./Faulkner awards. Philadelphia Fire was also awarded the American Book Award.

Wideman and Wier have both been the recipients of prestigious fellowships. Wideman was awarded a MacArthur Fellowship in 1993 and Wier a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1992. A fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts was also awarded to Wier in 1980.

Drinking claims another student

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. (AP) — A Rutgers University junior engineering student who fell down a flight of stairs following a night of drinking was taken off life support and died early yesterday, a university spokeswoman said. Jason Greco, 20, of Riverton, sustained head injuries after falling down the stairs in his Theta Chi fraternity house on Thursday night.

Greco was declared clinically dead Sunday and was kept on life support at Robert Wood Johnson University Hospital until his organs could be harvested, said university officials.

On the night of the accident, Greco had been drinking with friends at the Olde Queens Tavern, a popular off–campus bar, Middlesex County Prosecutor Glenn Berman told The Star–Ledger of Newark.

Agencies kept open for vote

By Alan Fram
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — White House and congressional budget bargainers intensified their talks on school spending and other issues yesterday as Congress voted to keep the government open for two more days amid indications that a deal was near.

After more than five hours of negotiating between White House chief of staff Erskine Bowles and GOP leaders, House Speaker Newt Gingrich said a deal could be completed by nightime and a package could be on the House floor by tomorrow.

"We've reached many tentative possible agreements, none of which count until we've finished up the whole thing," Gingrich said.

Twelve days into fiscal 1999, spending bills controlling about $500 billion worth of spending — nearly one-third of the federal budget — were still in play.

The Clinton administration has been demanding about $3 billion more, including $1.1 billion for hiring elementary school teachers plus money for dealing with climate change, aid to Russia and other proposals.

Republicans had been offering nearly $2.5 billion, but with some different priorities. The GOP proposed $1.1 billion that states could use to hire teachers or take any steps they want to reduce class size. They were offering half the $46 million Clinton wanted for food safety and none of the $100 million he wanted for toxic waste cleanups.

Just three weeks from Election Day, President Clinton tried anew to keep his education demands in the public spotlight. Before leaving for a political fund-raising trip to New York, he prodded Republicans on an issue that polls show scores well for Democrats. "I know there's an election coming, but members of Congress can return home to campaign knowing that they put progress ahead of partisanship on the important issue of education," Clinton said. "We need 21st century schools where teachers can teach and students can learn."

"This president thinks that if he says something in the State of the Union it will be done," House Majority Whip Tom DeLay, R-Texas, fired back. "He hasn't lifted a finger."

Bowles met with Gingrich, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., and other top Republicans.

While the bargaining proceeded, the House and Senate both agreed by voice vote to keep agencies operating through tomorrow night. A prior stopgap measure was expiring last night, and both sides hoped the latest short-term bill — the third — would be the last. "We are almost there, I hope," House Appropriations Committee Chairman Bob Livingston, R-La., said of the negotiations.

Lott told his colleagues that he believed a vote on the massive spending bill could occur tomorrow.

The two sides were also divided over scores of policy issues ranging from the use of statistical sampling for the 2000 census to whether taxpayer-financed needles should be distributed to drug users in the District of Columbia.

Other than approving the stopgap spending bill, the Senate spent a rare Columbus Day session with its members listening to each other give speeches.

Spy trial produces couple FBI watched

By Joseph Schuman
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — The FBI says Theresa Squillacote and Kurt Stand are "dedicated communists" who hate the U.S. government and betrayed it the first chance they got. Their attorneys say they are an emotionally battered couple who committed no crimes until the government trapped them.

Three days into one of the last spy trials of the Cold War, the evidence of wiretapped phone calls and pilfered Pentagon documents could point either way.

Squillacote, 40, and Stand, 43, are charged with conspiring to commit espionage, attempting espionage and illegally obtaining national defense documents.

Testimony thus far has traced the couple's college radical days at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, through clandestine — if probably legal — work for the former East Germany.

And testimony has detailed the FBI sting that prompted Squillacote to copy classified documents and give them to a man she thought was a South African intelligence agent.

Prosecutors have told the jury about secret codes, safe houses and miniature cameras allegedly given to the couple by their East German controllers. Squillacote won security clearance as a Pentagon lawyer too late to help East Gennany, the Soviet bloc country that no longer existed, the prosecution says.

"Dedicated communists," U.S. Assistant Attorney Randy Bellows has repeatedly called the couple.

Eventually, Squillacote contacted a Communist Party defense official in the new South African government of Nelson Mandela, the prosecution says. And when he appeared to "read between the lines," as she later told an undercover FBI agent, and sent her a new spymaster, she finally committed the espionage she had conspired to for more than a decade, the prosecution alleges. "I did it," Squillacote says excitedly to her brother in a phone conversation recorded by the FBI. "I did it, Mike. All these years. All these years, and I did it!"

Defense attorneys deny few of the facts, only their interpretation.

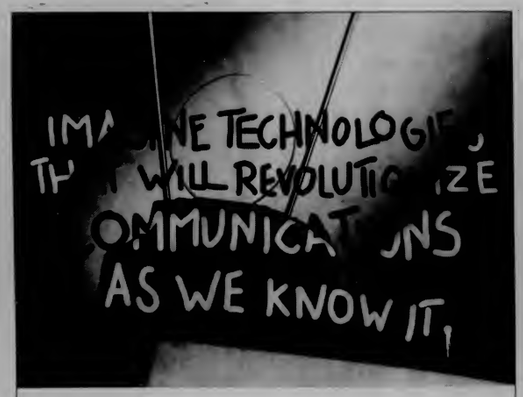
Those same tapes show a woman who was severely depressed and on anti-depressants, a woman whose emotions were closely studied by the FBI. Agents picked a moment when she was most vulnerable — even suicidal — to offer a chance at fulfilling her ideological dreams, according to defense attorneys.

The FBI profile compared her to a "newly pubescent child." Recorded conversations between Squillacote and Stand reveal two people almost childlike in the joy, fear and excitement they felt playing the spy game. They dithered over how she should transport the Pentagon papers, which she finally delivered in a tote bag, the prosecution says.

Transcripts of her October 1996 rendezvous in New York with the undercover FBI agent, masquerading as a South African, indicate she repeatedly expressed a desire to help by exchanging ideas about "building socialism." It was the FBI agent who said that if their relationship was to continue, she would need to supply "practical" information.

Special Agent Douglas Gregory, the undercover officer, insisted he nonetheless understood Squillacote was offering to spy, from the "context" of what she said. That context probably will emerge this week, when the jury hears testimony from James M. Clark — a college friend of the couple and a confessed spy who will testify against the two.

Squillacote's lawyer, Lawrence Robbins, calls the FBI meeting a "textbook case" of entrapment.



The prosecution says it has no proof Squillacote and Stand handled classified information before that meeting. Their work for the East Germans consisted of political and labor reports. Yet Robbins admits he must be cautious about his clients' "extremely unpopular ideology."

Three Americans win Nobel Prize for work related to lead on Viagra

By Malcom Ritter
Associated Press

Three Americans won the Nobel Prize in medicine yesterday for discovering that the body uses nitric oxide gas to make blood vessels relax and widen — a finding that helped lead to Viagra and could also pay off in treatments for heart disease.

In addition, it has triggered research that could lead to new treatments for cancer and septic shock.

The prize, announced in Sweden, went to Robert F. Furchgott, Louis J. Ignarro and Dr. Ferid Murad. Furchgott, 82, is a pharmacologist at the State University of New York Health Science Center at Brooklyn; Ignarro, 57, is at the University of California at Los Angeles; and Murad, 62, is at the University of Texas Medical School in Houston.

They will split the $978,000 prize.

Cells in the body make nitric oxide, which, paradoxically, is also an air pollutant in auto exhaust. It is different from nitrous oxide, better known as laughing gas. The researchers discovered that the body's own nitric oxide acts as a signal, telling blood vessels to dilate. That, in turn, lowers blood pressure.

The work already has inspired a treatment for dangerously high blood pressure in the lungs of infants. Babies breathe the gas. "Now, finally this discovery can be put to use in treatment of numerous pathologies," said Ignarro, who was reached in Naples, Italy. "The future of pharmacology is in the creation of a superaspirin that will be fundamental in the prevention of heart attacks, of cardiovascular disease, of arteriosclerosis." Scientists were surprised when Furchgott and Ignarro reported the findings in 1986. Nitric oxide was the first gas to be identified as a signal in the body.

"It was a sensation that this simple common air pollutant ... could exert important functions" in animals and people, said the Karolinska Institute in Stockholm, which awards the prize. The gas makes blood vessels dilate by relaxing the vessels' smooth muscles. It can help trigger erection of the penis the same way, because the relaxation lets blood flow in. Viagra was designed to work by blocking an enzyme that interferes with nitric oxide's effect.

The prize-winning work contributed "a small piece of information" to the development of Viagra, said Mariann Caprino, spokeswoman for Viagra maker Pfizer Inc.

Dr. Valentin Fuster, president of the American Heart Association, called the nitric oxide discovery "one of the most important in the history of cardiovascular medicine."

By showing the gas played an important role in the body, the researchers set off a cascade of studies that discovered other key things the gas does, Fuster said.

The wide-ranging results may pay off in new treatments for:

• Atherosclerosis, a thickening of artery walls due to fatty deposits. Nitric oxide has turned out to be one of the body's main weapons against atherosclerosis, said Dr. Jonathan Stamler of the Duke University Medical Center and the Howard Hughes Medical Institute.

• Septic shock, the dangerous drop in blood pressure caused by white cells pumping out too much nitric oxide in response to infections. Drugs that reduce the levels of active nitric oxide are being studied in people.

• Cancer. White cells use nitric oxide to defend against tumors, and scientists are studying whether they can harness the substance's anti-cancer ability.

German leftist named new finance minister

By Tony Czuczka
Associated Press

BONN, Germany — Chancellor-elect Gerhard Schroeder took firm control of his emerging government yesterday, naming a traditional leftist as German finance minister and quashing a power struggle in the incoming administration.

Schroeder named Social Democratic chairman Oskar Lafontaine to the powerful finance post during the party's executive committee meeting, held apart from coalition talks with the future junior partner, the Greens.

Lafontaine was in line for the job after playing a key role in the left's Sept. 27 election victory. He had created a stir the day after the election by urging Germany's independent central bank to cut interest rates to spur the economy.

Lafontaine has also called for international cooperation to combat turmoil in financial markets and heavily influenced the Social Democrats' campaign platform with its planks for higher wages, lower working hours and a strong social welfare state. But despite being viewed as an old-style leftist who strongly believes the state should provide for its citizens, Lafontaine has pledged the new government to strict fiscal prudence.

Ignoring dissent from Social Democratic lawmakers, Schroeder also stripped Rudolf Scharping of his post as the party's leader in parliament and tapped him for defense minister. Scharping had strongly resisted the move.

The decision followed days of infighting and signaled another victory for Scharping's rival, Lafontaine, who has increased his strong influence over the party since the election triumph. Lafontaine, 55, is credited with reviving the party's fortunes after ousting the lackluster Scharping as party chairman in 1995. He imposed unity on the often squabbling Social Democrats and last year led a blockade of Chancellor Helmut Kohl's legislative agenda in the upper house of parliament.

A physicist by training, Lafontaine challenged the conservative wing of his party in the 1980s by opposing the stationing of U.S. missiles in Germany.

Nowadays, his passion is economics. He published a book this year with his third wife, economist Christa Mueller, called "Don't Fear Globalization — Prosperity and Jobs for All" that delves into his favorite themes.

must be on low income urban areas as a top priority for job creation and private capital investment.

Cellucci has also filed for the Gun Free School bill, which will allow principals to suspend students for one year who bring a gun to school.

"The governor wants to keep schools safe and reduce crime. This, in combination with other programs will help protect the students of Massachusetts," Feedeman said.

Harshbarger's school safety platform includes various ways to drive drugs, gangs and guns out of the school system. Creating Gun Free School Zones within 1,000 feet of school property and allowing school officials to ban clothing which might be considered disruptive, are some of his plans to improve school safety.

"What Scott (Harshbarger) is supporting is conflict resolution in our schools. Supporting programs like peer mediation and also train our teachers in preventive measures and not just punish students. The only way to get rid of violence is by creating alternatives," Chaudhuri said.

War and peace

As I crossed Market Street in Lowell I beheld a little female figure, not five feet tall, wearing a cao dai and a conical hat. A little old Vietnamese lady. As I surveyed the Mamasan, I heard a low-flying helicopter overhead. The old Beatles song, Dear Prudence, suddenly came to mind. I was transported — by the beat of the helicopter's rotary wing — out of Massachusetts, back in time more than a quarter century to a place beyond the South China Sea.

Vietnam. I was riding in a UH-1 Huey "slick" to a patrol insertion point. It was early in 1972. Nixon had reduced our commitment in support of the Republic of Vietnam to about 11% of 1968 troop levels, but he had committed the unpardonable by equalizing the draft and eliminating the II-S deferment. Middle-class college darlings became just as liable to get nailed by the draft as blue-collar boys had been, and there was great wailing and gnashing of teeth throughout the land. Our gallant allies even started a draft of their own.

> "I was spit on, both by fellow students and by faculty, more times than I care to remember. I saw a vet in a wheelchair get that treatment."

Our mission was a reconnaissance up north in I Corps, a little west of a hamlet called Ly Bai and a little east of the Laotian border. The locals were friendly. The French had called them les montagnards ("the mountain people"). They called themselves the Hmong. They were physically small. They were giants in terms of courage and straightforward intelligence.

We flew over rice paddies that looked like patchworks of mirrors in the sunlight. Now and then I would get a glimpse of the two snakes — AH-1 Cobra gunships — that made up our escort. The song, Dear Prudence, had been on AFVN radio that morning and I couldn't get it out of my nineteen-year-old mind.

The crew chief gave us the sign to get ready and got on his gun like he was serious. I scanned the woodline for muzzle flashes. From a distance they look like strobe lights and nowadays strobes always remind me of muzzle flashes.

We scooted out and got down. Our patrol leader gave an up and the aircraft took off. The blast of the downwash and the loud whine of the Huey's turbine faded into a flutter in the distance and everything was quiet.

In a couple hours we came up on a Hmong*ville*. Hell, it was only about seven hoochies. I heard a funny, muffled noise. The place was full of dead indigenous. All ages. The NVA had paid this place a visit. The North Vietnamese didn't like the Hmong. The odd noise I heard was the grunting of a couple of pigs. They were feeding on the corpses.

Some months later my tour was up and I went back to the world. I went home and went to college. The war had been an uncomfortable subject for years before I was in the service, but I was not prepared for the abuse I took for having gone. I was spit on, both by fellow students and by faculty, more times than I care to remember. I saw a vet in a wheelchair get that treatment. I suppose you could say our tormenters' were people of uncompromising principle. One self-righteous professor gave all my work back to me with a big, red "F." The little miscreant told me it was his "moral obligation." After a year I went back into the Army without loss of rank. It was the only home I had anymore.

I retired from the 10th Special Forces Group in 1995 and went back to college.

Last year I had a class with a professor who seemed to have remained firmly rooted in the rock 'n roll leftism of the Vietnam era. He saw fit to throw some of the old ration my way. I thought that had gone out of style, I have to admit, it got to me. Perhaps he took it as an affront to have an old vet as a student after all the sacrifices he has made, by going to demonstrations and getting high,- all those years. All those bumper stickers! All in vain!

I have great respect for my former enemies who put their lives on the line for what they believed in. I can't say the same for the wine-and-cheese-party "activists."

Back in Lowell, the roar of the traffic helicopter's rotor faded into a flutter in the distance as it headed toward the Connector. The old Vietnamese lady disappeared around a corner and I had to think for a second to remember where the hell I was going.

Stop making sense

I removed any system of logic from my head a few weeks ago, as a matter of survival at this school. Well, I didn't remove it completely — it just slips away when presented with something so irrevocably irrational that otherwise, if I were to apply logic to it, I'd have a breakdown. It's all very Darwinian: insects and animals start to look like their surroundings, fish give off a foul tasting aura to predators, and the poor UMass student gets stupid. In fact, some people, it seems, got a head start before stepping foot on campus.

Mike Messaros

It's actually something that is needed in the real world, because we live in a day when oral sex is not considered oral sex, but oral satisfaction and satisfaction can be applied to chewing Wrigley's Gum, which is in no way sexual and if it is, do I have some stories for my high school reunion, finally). This is what is considered "logical" in today's world.

> "Oral sex is not considered oral sex, but oral satisfaction, and satisfaction can be applied to chewing Wrigley's Gum, which is in no way sexual."

It paid off last week, when I was sent a bill for more than $2,000 for on-campus housing and a meal plan. Of course, it was sent to my off-campus address. So I went to clear things up.

At first it seemed alright. Just fill out some paperwork — which I've actually done enough of to receive credit for and I'm good to go. It's the normal paper chase that any student is used to. But imagine my surprise, when my record was called up on the housing computer (I swear it was a Commodore 64), that I would be assessed a $100 penalty for cancelling my housing.

I stood in that same spot not a month before and was told that I wouldn't be penalized, because I was never even billed for housing. In fact, they couldn't even find my proxy sheet requesting new housing. They never had a room for me, yet I was expected to pay a penalty? This was something new and different to me.

But I did not panic. Instead, my new natural defense system kicked in, shutting down most of my brain and dripping some oh-so-sweet endorphins into my bloodstream. I sighed, relaxed and smiled the biggest smile of all time. "Thank you," I breathed, and backed out of the office, grinning like a fool. God knows what would have happened if the "stupid" switch hadn't been tripped.

I can't describe how exactly I felt once my stupid-high wore off. I mean, I'm being penalized $100 for something I never actually got. You may as well penalize my unborn children while you're at it — I mean, they didn't cancel their housing, either (Oh, great. Now I'm giving them ideas...).

Maybe it was anger, maybe I was just a bit confused. But I was surprised to learn that actual businesses use this practice too. I went into Newbury Comics:

"Uh, do you have the new Springsteen box set?" (I can't wait...)

"No, that doesn't come out until November."

"Awww, I was really looking forward to that."

"A lot of people are. That will be $100."

I forked over the money. I mean, what other option did I have? Hungry, I decided to head over to Antonio's. "Do you have a slice of chocolate pizza?"

"Chocolate pizza?" The man looked at me quizzically. "We don't make chocolate pizza. Never heard of it."

"Really? But think about it: everyone loves pizza, and everyone loves chocolate. So why not chocolate pizza? I think it's a darling idea."

"Hmmm," he considered it, "it does sound good, but we don't make it. That'll be $100."

"Wait, I want a Cherry Coke, too."

"OK, that'll be $100.75."

Thank God they had that, because I only had $150 on me.

Maybe this is how all businesses should be run; a kind of Russian roulette/Go-Fish game. If you really want something (say, food, clothing or housing, for example), you should have to put something on the line for it. I can see worried husbands, at the end of their ropes, desperately putting their wedding hands down on the counter at McDonalds, shakily asking "do you have...the McRib?"

The cashier shakes his head in a mix of sympathy, thinking "you poor dumb jerk." He sweeps the ring quickly off the counter with one of those sticks they use in Atlantic City. The husband breaks down to his knees, crying "she's gonna kill me!" The guy behind me whispers "I hear they have boku McNuggets, but let's just keep that between you, me and the walls."

I am actually worried for the day when I will be forty-years-old, sitting in my den, watching some hockey with the wife — yeah, life is sweet. Then the phone rings: "Mr Messaros, this is the UMass Housing Office. We just noticed that you never said you weren't living on campus this semester, and you haven't told us in quite a while, in fact. You owe us $1 million."

"But I graduated 18 years ago!"

"And when were you going to get around to telling us that?"

So as I sit there, in year 2017, worried about sooth- guarding the rug and "getting those damn neighborhood kids off my lawn," for a split second, I just won't care. The endorphins will rush, and synapses will close and I'll just smile and nod into the phone. "Thank you," I'll say. And I'll say it now: Thank you, UMass.

Ahhhh, sweet endorphins...

Who's on top?

Nowhere else is the well-documented connection between sex and violence more evident than in a comparison of America's twin passions, professional wrestling and pornographic films. Many parallels between the two are immediately evident: an under-emphasis on plot and acting, dialogue consisting chiefly of grunts and moans, predictability, naked performers, and humongous breasts. But a less superficial examination reveals startling and genuinely thought-provoking themes that could help us better understand ourselves, each other, and our world. After all, the only thing men and women do is fight and have sex. Kinkier couples, at the same time.

Mike Rybicki

"Real" wrestling and "real" sex are boring to watch, and oddly enough the two activities look pretty much the same. The professionals make it far more entertaining. The authenticity of the action never in question, both are free to consist of outlandish positions, poses, and holds. In addition, foreign objects are often involved.

> "Wrestling is something for children that adults enjoy, porn is something for adults that children really, really enjoy."

Both wrestling and porn rely on grotesque illusions of physical perfection. Wrestling has steroids, porn has silicone.

Although adult entertainers actually are copulating in their movies and wrestlers really do take a pounding in the ring, any lust or rage is wholly theoretical. Disbelief having been thus suspended, the industries are free to do away with pesky things like weight classes. In the same sense that Andre the Giant could step into the squared circle against a far smaller foe, beautiful women in pornography are often depicted having sex with fat, hairy schlubs who by the merest coincidence are also producing the film.

Wrestlers and porno actresses have ridiculous fake names that they're constantly changing, heavy on alliteration to make them more memorable. Rowdy Roddy, meet Wendy Whoppers. The line is blurred further by the fact that many wrestlers have names that make them sound like male porn stars, i.e. Big John Stud, Jake the Snake, Greg "The Hammer" Valentine, "Superfly" Jimmy Snuka.

Wrestling has the Royal Rumble, porn has the orgy.

Let us not fail to consider the predominately male target audience. Wrestling is something for children that adults enjoy, porn is something for adults that children really, really, really enjoy.

Both professions provide a haven for washed-up celebrities. In fact, they even shared Tonya Harding. Female pro-wrestling doesn't really work. Neither does pornography for women. Many porno actresses have attempted to cross over into legitimate acting just like pro-wrestlers. Sadly, their best work is always limited to their chosen field. As poignant and moving as Hulk Hogan's performance was in "Suburban Commando," it can't help to rival the theatrical heft of his steel cage match against King Kong Bundy. And Traci Lord's finest roles, by her own admission, took place mainly on all fours. As a result, wrestlers and porn stars rely mainly on cameos in real films that their fans are embarrassed to spot.

Each year, one lucky gal receives an award for Best Actress in a porno movie. This is akin to wrestler Dino Bravo proclaiming himself "Canada's strongest man."

The age limits are revealing as well. If a porno starlet looks a day over 22 she's reduced to fodder for the "mature" fetishists, whereas decaying fan-favorite Hulk Hogan will be successfully defending his title long after your grandchildren have died. This discrepancy is alleviated somewhat by the fact that porn stars nevertheless enjoy long careers, having gotten into the business around the age of eight.

It's obvious how these two paragons of entertainment could be seamlessly combined into one gala pay-per-view extravaganza, especially because both are gaining mainstream acceptability and Miss Elizabeth seems to be quite the little tramp. But the fact of the matter is, the basic elements are already merged each and every day on the Jerry Springer show, the very same program rumored to be a sign of the decline of civilization. When word got out recently that the show's liaisons were fabricated and its brawls orchestrated, many journalistic sages predicted its demise. Makes sense. After all, who in the world would ever want to watch a thing like that.

N.H. college savings plan offers tax benefits

By Katherine Webster
Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. — Richard Feigenbaum was looking for a way to invest money for his children for college, but couldn't find a plan that fit.

Feigenbaum, who lives in Wellesley, Mass., wasn't thrilled with the modest earnings and rigid rules of his state's plan. He makes too much money to qualify for new IRA options, and he didn't want to invest money in his children's names because they would control it when they turned 21.

Then he came across New Hampshire's plan on the World Wide Web. The plan makes it easy to invest, offers tax breaks and reasonable earnings — and set his mind at rest.

"We all have this quiet fear that we're not doing enough to save for college, and this helped me control that fear."

Feigenbaum said. "Now I know I need to save 250 bucks a month for this child and 150 bucks a month for that child and I'll be fine." New Hampshire's "Unique College Investing Plan" is one of 15 state college savings trusts that have sprung up since Congress gave federal tax benefits to state-sponsored college plans in 1996 and 1997. Another eight states and the District of Columbia are working on savings trusts, and 19 states offer prepaid tuition plans.

Under all the plans, federal taxes are deferred until the money is withdrawn; earnings then are taxed at the child's rate. Most states exempt earnings from state taxes, too.

Pam Taylor, director of the National Association of State Treasurers, says the biggest benefit of the plans is that they encourage early savings.

"These plans are aimed at people who are probably the less sophisticated investor, less disciplined. It's convenient, secure, and it makes it much easier to get on that track. We tend to put these things off," Taylor said.

But the "Unique" plan has unique advantages that have made it a model for other states, financial planners say.

It was the first open to anyone in any state. The money can be used for education expenses at any accredited college, vocational school or graduate school in the country.

"We're a small state and we import a lot of students and we're also exporting a lot of students, so if we tried to have a plan that was restricted to New Hampshire residents or New Hampshire schools, it would be hard to make it fly," said state Treasurer Georgie Thomas.

Ric Edelman, a financial adviser in Fairfax, Va., believes plans like New Hampshire's eventually will make prepaid tuition plans. Education IRAs and outright gifts to children (under the Uniform Gifts to Minors Act) obsolete because they offer better earnings, more flexibility and greater parental control.

Savings trusts invest in stocks and bonds, which can earn 8 percent to 10 percent per year over time. That compares favorably to the average 5 percent rate of college tuition inflation, Edelman said.

"It's far superior to the tuition prepayment plans," Edelman said. "If you live in New Hampshire, it's flawless."

But he cautions outside investors to check their own states' plans before investing in New Hampshire's, because earnings may be taxed in the investor's state. For example, Feigenbaum's children will have to pay Massachusetts income tax when the money is withdrawn.

New York and Delaware have set up similar savings trusts, said Gary Shatsky, vice president of the National Association of Personal Financial Advisers.

New York's plan, managed by the world's largest pension system, TIAA-CREF, offers an additional benefit for state residents, Shatsky said: A New York income tax deduction for the parent (or other donor) on contributions of up to $5,000 per year.

"New York appears to have gone to the well in every single area," Shatsky said. "Contributing will actually save you money on taxes." New Hampshire has no income tax.

Among savings plans sponsored by states, the main alternative to trusts like New Hampshire's is a prepaid tuition plan. Such plans usually guarantee payment of tuition and fees at an in-state school — or the equivalent to spend at an out-of-state school — if parents make regular investments based on a child's age.

The Unique plan's earning potential is greater, but earnings are not guaranteed, said Abram Claude, vice president for business development at Fidelity Investments. Boston-based Fidelity manages both the New Hampshire and Delaware plans.

"Some states are putting a guarantee behind a pre-pay plan, and for some people that's going to be comforting," Claude said. Other investors think they can do better with a private investment plan in the child's name, such as a Uniform Gifts to Minors account. Earnings are taxed at the child's rate each year, so there is no tax when the money is used. But the parent has no control over how the money is spent once the child comes of age — 21 in most states.

What do the states get out of state plans? Educated, debt-free citizens, Thomas said.

"If we can help people come out of college without being burdened with tremendous debt, then we've done a great deal," Thomas said.

"We encourage educating our citizens so we're competitive for businesses. To my mind, it's just darn good public policy."

Independent voters have not changed the tough luck of few independent candidates

BOSTON (AP) — Independents make up the largest voting block in the state, accounting for almost half of those eligible to head for the polls in November.

Yet only 6 percent of the nearly 400 candidates running for political office this year are not members of a major party. Analysts say that despite the growing numbers of independent voters, many Massachusetts politicians know that a party label is a must-have come election time.

"There's no pattern of success with these guys unless they're enormously wealthy or already have a high profile as a previous officeholder or celebrity," Lou DiNatale, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts in Boston, told The Patriot Ledger of Quincy.

Among the challenges faced by independent candidates: They have no party to throw them fund-raisers; no advice or volunteers from state party and local ward committees; and no publicity from primary elections.

And according to DiNatale, independent voters aren't necessarily likely to shun party candidates.

"The belief that people who register independent are not predisposed to vote for either Republicans or Democrats is wrong," he said. "If you changed the rules so that independents could no longer vote in primaries, most of them would choose to be either Republicans or Democrats."

Independent voters outnumbered Democrats in Massachusetts at about the same time state law changed to allow Independents to vote in the primary of their choice. Before then, people without parties forfeited their votes in primaries, often determining the outcome of the election in such a heavily Democratic state.

Two politicians from the South Shore are trying to beat the odds this year.

Stephen Elliott of Bridgewater is hoping to represent Halifax, Bridgewater, Easton and Raynham in the House. Larry Mackin of Braintree is running for Norfolk County sheriff.

"It's very hard. I know I'm the underdog," Mackin said. "In everything from union endorsements to campaign sign placements, I am at an incredible disadvantage."

Still, both candidates said they think they have a chance because many voters are sick of what they see as a corrupt two-party system.

"There's tremendous anger out there toward both political parties," Mackin said.

Secretary of State William Galvin said he sees the rise of unenrolled voters as a reflection of a larger trend toward uninvolvement.

Milosevic has 4 days to end repression of Kosovo before airstrikes

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

NEW YORK — President Clinton welcomed a commitment yesterday by Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic to comply with U.N. demands to end his seven-month repression of Kosovo Albanians. But he warned that any backtracking would bring swift NATO air strikes. Clinton said NATO's political leadership, meeting in Brussels, Belgium, took a dual-track approach: authorizing air strikes, but also giving Milosevic a four-day breathing period. In those four days international inspectors will try to verify that Milosevic has fully met his commitments.

"Commitments are not compliance," Clinton said in a statement he read after a campaign fund-raising event in New York. "Balkan gravoyards are filled with President Milosevic's broken promises." The president said NATO's decision marked just the second time in the alliance's nearly 50-year history that it authorized the use of force — "and the first time in the case of a country brutally repressing its own people."

"The international community is now prepared to act," he said. Clinton said Milosevic had agreed to allow a "robust" team of international inspectors — monitoring both by land and air — to see that Serb troops pull back, that refugees be allowed to return to their homes, and that other conditions of the U.N. Security Council be met.

White House press secretary Joe Lockhart said the monitoring force would number about 2,000, including an unknown number of Americans. Any American participants would not include combat troops, Lockhart said.

Clinton said his special envoy to the Balkans, Richard Holbrooke, had won a series of commitments from Milosevic during a long series of talks in Belgrade. Holbrooke reported the results of his talks to the North Atlantic Council, NATO's political arm, yesterday evening.

"If fully implemented — and that is a critical and very big 'if' — these commitments could achieve the international community's objectives as stated in the United Nations resolution," Clinton said.

He president said NATO "will remain ready to take military action" if Milosevic breaks his word.

There had been repeated warnings by U.S. officials that NATO military strikes were planned if Milosevic refused to go along with the U.N. demands, which were spelled out on Sept. 23.

"Our patience is running out," Defense Secretary William Cohen said yesterday in Kuwait, alluding to the possibility of NATO airstrikes.

The Security Council demands include withdrawal of more Serb troops from Kosovo, allowing humanitarian aid to refugees and opening up serious talks with the secessionists on the restoration of self-rule for the province, which is a part of Serbia, the main Yugoslav republic. Serbia emerged the dominant part of Yugoslavia during the 1991-95 Balkan wars.

The action taken by NATO in Brussels last night involved approval of an "activation order" for airstrikes. In essence it gave NATO military commanders the authority to strike, although NATO took the additional decision to delay any strikes for 96 hours.

U.S. military officials familiar with the strike planning say a phased air campaign would evolve from limited to heavy strikes interspersed with pauses to give Milosevic a chance to reconsider. B-52 bombers armed with cruise missiles, B-2 and F-117 stealth aircraft carrying 2,000-pound bombs and F-16 fighters with radar-seeking missiles were among the weapons ready to be called into action. The carrier USS Eisenhower with some 70 combat aircraft and other ships armed with Tomahawk cruise missiles were poised in the Mediterranean Sea.

A Tribe Called Quits: Swan Song in Worcester

COURTESY CHRISTIAN CANTER

A Tribe Called Quest put on a less than memorable farewell performance in Worcester on Saturday night.

By David Katzoff
Collegian Correspondent

A TRIBE CALLED QUEST
The Palladium
Oct. 10

WORCESTER — I can remember the days when the small crew from Linden Blvd. in Queens used to play at East Village coffeeshops on weeknights. The four members, John, Malik, Ali Shaheed and Jarobi were driven solely by their love for the music and the creativity that went behind it. Before A Tribe was called Quest, they were the Crush Connection and the aspiring talent of John Davis III, a.k.a. MC Love Child, was recognized by Afrika Baby Bam, a member of the Jungle Brothers and Native Tongues. After making his debut on the JB's "Black Is Black" the artist now known as Q-Tip was adopted by the Native Tongues family and offered a leg-up in the industry. However, the visions of Crush Connection, who had been a crew since they were 12-years-old, far surpassed any individual glory. The nucleus remained intact and soon these visions morphed into A Tribe Called Quest.

Fast forward to ten years and five albums later. With worldwide success, suddenly the motivational factors that steered Tribe over the years have vanished. With this in mind, a sold-out Palladium, well-aware of their disbanding, awaits...

The in-unison chants of "TRIBE CALLED QUEST!!, TRIBE CALLED QUEST!!" before they entered the stage was my first indication that this would not be the way I wanted to remember Linden Blvd's finest. The majority of the crowd was a raucous cross between Kiss fans and Rage Against the Machine groupies, making the audience vibe more like a WCW Nitro event. When Tribe finally entered, it was reminiscent of a Chicago Bulls playoff game with a drum roll, flickering stage lights and a PA announcer exclaiming, "And nowww... the moment you've all been waiting for!!!..."

Despite the setting, it was nice to see all four members together again. As they began with "Start it Up," I couldn't help wondering if my demeanor was affected by the position of my seat. And let me give these Worcester kids some credit, they did get amped and Tribe not only fed off the energy, they catered to it. Perhaps I was just a disgruntled, disenchanted: it was the purest of low-key shows where hip- hop is the overriding common bond of the crowd mentality. I say this because the first eight rows turned into a mosh-pit and crowd surfing section...Need I say more?

The show itself proved that the days of coffeeshops and Crush Connection were sadly far behind. Their set was fairly short and it ended abruptly. Although they covered a large chunk of all five albums, most of the songs were only a verse or two long. There were also some questionable selections such as "Everything is Fair" and "Sky Pager," with "Scenario," a bona-fide crowd-pleaser, ending suddenly in the middle of Jarobi's cover for Busta Rhymes verse.

A peculiar audience request session followed, which was a five minute break in the music so the spotlight could pan around the room capturing sweaty, loud-mouths screaming out songs. This broke into "Da Booty" (which nobody requested) and after that they abandoned the stage. The encore was more like an intermission and when they came back on, the audience was neither surprised, nor overjoyed.

I will still maintain the belief that the charisma of Q-Tip gives him a unique stage presence and Phife's five-foot antics make him one of the liveliest emcees in the business. Since I have seen what they are capable of, this performance, indeed their swan song, was especially hard to stomach. They ended on "Find A Way" which was ironic because I left the Palladium on Saturday night trying desperately to find a way to dissolve the sour taste I had been left with. Even though the crowd was engaged, even though all four members may have felt satisfied with the energy response, it was evident that A Tribe Called Quest lost that indescribable motivation that had driven them for so long.

DJ Spooky excites Pearl St. with a little help from EBN

By Tanya Mannes
Collegian Staff

DJ SPOOKY with EBN
Pearl St.
Oct. 7

NORTHAMPTON — The people who came for EBN and stayed for DJ Spooky were by no means disappointed. The show began with an EBN film of, as one attendee described it, "cool stuff to look at." A Tony Robbins lookalike morphed into a series of sounds and repeated movements. So did the President, the First Lady, various news anchormen and women, and Michael Jackson. Michael and Janet's co-creation, the video "Scream," became an unrecognizable cacophony of sounds.

Next played Plastina Mosh, an unenthusiastic Spanish-speaking group. One of their songs was entitled, "Mi amor es cerveza," or "My love is beer." Overall, their songs were nothing original, and that was without understanding the no doubt similarly mediocre lyrics.

When DJ Spooky appeared with his electric upright bass, the crowd was excited to see that EBN was with him, wearing stiff navy blue jackets with their logo. DJ Spooky, wearing a fisherman's hat, greeted the crowd, "Massachusetts, how are you feeling out there?" He moved into a reflective number with the lyrics, "Minds in motion/As we cruise all the way down to the ocean." His trademark multicultural sound came out with some Asian-sounding chords in the next piece.

Spooky had a way of talking to the audience, very smooth and philosophical. He had a "behind the scenes" presence despite the fact that he was right onstage. But he was definitely calling the shots. With his dialogue to the audience, "We're just gonna let the music speak," he moved into "Universal Robot" from his newest album Riddim Warfare. By far the best rendition of the night was "Stoppin' Objects," also off of Riddim, which translated well to the live setting. He moved onto "Object Unknown," which was tight, well-meshed, and full of the "sounds of my neighborhood," as DJ Spooky put it.

He finished up by doing, literally, "five minutes of bass," which held the attention of the crowd, as the hyper members of EBN egged him on. The drummer made an impact at the end with a crazy solo during which he was throwing the sticks up, catching them in his mouth, and just as fast grabbing them out of the air. Overall, EBN and DJ Spooky made a good combination, each highlighting the other's strength.

Willie! — A learning experience

By Mike Messaros

WILLIE NELSON
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
Oct. 11

Who would have thought that during a long weekend, my one oasis of learning would come during Willie Nelson's performance at the packed Fine Arts Center on Sunday night? Among the things I learned as the poles reversed and a little bit of country crept into our northern climes:

 Willie doesn't exactly cater to a "young" audience.

Willie's audience had an average age of about 40.

 Willie's a cyber–cowboy

One of his roadies announced that we could visit Willie's new website. Who knew?

 Willie's middle name begins with 'H'

My friend suggested it stood for "Hollywood," after Willie told a story about filming a CBS movie with "Chris, Waylon and Travis Tritt."

 An oversized American flag has just as many stars and stripes as a normal sized one

During the first song a huge American flag unfurled behind the band, apropos of nothing, only to be raised after that song, never to be seen again. "It's like a big patriotic cave in here," my friend said. It did not draw the fervent reaction the oversized Texas flag drew during his encore. Are you ready for some football?

 Willie keeps it all in the family

His little sister played piano the whole night, and even led one song. The piano took center stage during a beautiful rendition of "Georgia On My Mind." And he sang a nice little number about him and his drummer out on the road, entitled — "Me and Paul." Guitarist Jody Payne took over lead vocals impressively on a couple of songs, including "Workingman's Blues." And Mickey Raphael's harmonica playing was impressive without ever being oppressive (John Popper, take note.)

 Willie has a lot of bandannas

He just kept pulling them out, tying them around his guitar neck and slipping them onto his head. Then, when a random audience member would toss him a hat or a new bandanna, he'd put it on, tossing the one he was wearing to his adoring fan. Which leads me to the next nugget o' knowledge:

 Willie doesn't worry about cooties

It's not like he inspected the hats before putting them on.

 Willie has a lot of songs

With over 200 albums, there was a lot of Willie to draw from. He relegated songs from his new album to a short section towards the end of his set. "I Never Cared For You" and "Everywhere I Go" highlighted what he drew from Teatro. Otherwise, he played a lot of his popular favorites, like "On the Road Again" and a gorgeous version of "To All the Girls I've Loved Before."

 Willie's shows go on and on... and on

The show might actually still be going on at this moment if you want to check it out.

 Too much Willie is not always a good thing

Willie kicked out the jams for over two hours, and the audience ate up every bit of it, shouting back "Alright!" during "Good Morning America" every time the lyric "How are you?" came up. It came off as ridiculous, but doesn't every generation indulge in the ridiculous when at a concert? The generational equivalent of shouting "Alright!," during that song is shouting "Leonard Bernstein" at an REM show for a younger music fan. And the Texan flag that drew so many cheers was just as cheesy as the huge, smoking Buddha at a Cypress Hill show. I did feel alien at times, but all in all, it was a good time. There were some moments of beauty in all the barn-burning that went on. And the way that he posed for impromptu pictures for the audience, tossing out a "thank you" whenever a song was met with applause, proved just how relevant Willie is in this world.

Willie Nelson had a lotta country goin' on at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Sunday night.

P.J. Harvey not expecting to find Desire anytime soon

COURTESY MARIA MOCHNACZ

Is This Desire?, P.J. Harvey's latest release, leaves the listener looking for satisfaction.

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

IS THIS DESIRE?
P.J. Harvey
Island

One cannot ask a question like "Is this desire?" without conjuring up certain pathetic, pessimistic images. It's not a question asked in confidence, in the throes of passion. It's a question asked inside the mind of a neglected lover, smoking while his or her partner lies asleep. It's an ironic, loaded question, filled with inherent disappointment. It brings to mind the theme explored in Peggy Lee's "Is That All There Is?" — covered by P.J. Harvey on her underwhelming collaboration with John Parrish, Dance Hall at Louse Point.

So to name an album with the question, there's a built-in feeling around the songs. On P.J. Harvey's new album, she gives us song after song of women, seemingly doomed, but we never know why. "Catherine liked high places/ High up on the hills," we're told in "THE Wind." Instead of being a foreshadow of death or a fall (that would be too easy), it's supposed to be a form isolation — self-imposed isolation, if she likes the high places. Harvey frames it like a ghost story she would have heard as a child and tells it in a stark whisper. She once was a great woman, "but now she sits and moans/ And listens to the wind blow."

Such is the fate of any of her subjects on this album. Desire seems to be arrested, and no one can attain any sort of fulfillment. It's an untouchable thing that everyone seems to be striving for. But does it even exist? Would we know if we had it? In "My Beautiful Leah," the narrator bemoans his fate with Leah: "She was always so needing/ Said 'I have no-one'/ Even as I held her/ She went out looking for someone."

The album opener, "Angelene," presents us with a narrator who knows desire — for a price. Over a lovely piano figure, she sings that "Love for money is my sin/ Any man who calls, I'll let him in." But she separates this from her true desire, who she sees "Two thousand miles away/ He walks along the coast." "I've heard there's joy untold," she sings later. Now, whether there is an actual someone on that coast, or if it's just an invention of someone searching for desire, is untold. It could be seen as a variable — there is someone, somewhere, but she just doesn't know where exactly. She keeps the faith; she and Leah both keep longing for an unknown love.

It's a very pessimistic album. Some people just do not fall in love; they keep looking. No one on this album seems to end up happy. No one is spared, male or female. In "A Perfect Day Elise," Elise ends up rejecting her lover: "She turned her back on him, facing the frame/ Said 'Listen Joe, don't you come back here again.'" Joe ends up walking the beach, burning his skin, and returning to Elise in room 509, entreating her to come out with him.

On "Catherine," the narrator aches for the subject of the song: "I envy the road, the ground you tread under/ I envy the wind, your hair riding under/ I envy the pillow your head rests and slumbers," Harvey sings in a contained voice. When she sings the next line — "I envy to murderous envy your lover" — only the music changes, not her voice, cool and cold as ice.

If there's a problem with this album, it might be the music. While some songs benefit from the ambient arrangements, others don't. The music of "Catherine" is subdued, full of organs and distant drums, and fits the discomforting desire that is being sung about. But "My Beautiful Leah" rests on a beat that seems to be stolen from a Bjork remix. The bass is stretched and distorted, sounding like it's coming out of a broken speaker playing too loud. While it works for a bit, the song never progresses or develops. It's so short that it feels like a rushed, undeveloped sketch.

"Joy" also rests on a bleating bass line, and is not helped by Harvey's reading of the lyrics, shouting above the electronic din — with so many sounds competing for prominence in the mix, the song feels rushed and amateurish.

The whole album toes the line between gorgeous and rushed and this lack of cohesion in the end becomes damaging. While some songs, like "Joy," don't work too well, the album is musically daring, building on the electronic direction forged on To Bring You My Love.

It takes a bit to get into this album. The music is harsh and lyrically she gives us little to hold on to. It's a tough album, but hey, if you want accessible, go listen to the Barenaked Ladies. B

BORDERscape 2000 a triumph of imagination

By Timothy Matos

BORDERSCAPE 2000
Rand Theater
Oct. 9

It has finally happened. "The nation-state has collapsed. The ex-US of A has fragmented into a mynad of micro– republics...governed by a Chicano prime minister named Gran Vato. Rage is passe, and the only way to leave is to [go] up on stage and practice ritual suicide." Interested? Let me introduce you to a fantastic journey called BORDERscape 2000. BORDERscape 2000, written by Guillermo Gomez-Pena, was presented this weekend as a part of Intersection — a three-day gathering exploring new work practices by artists of color. Gomez-Pena's multi-media, performance art extravaganza, works to de-center our culture in order to force our ideals out into the open.

The University's Rand Theater, heavy with fog, ringing with a Santa Maria hymn, transforms into a den of artifice and becomes a catalyst for change. The concrete walls echo dissonant ideological chords, which, as they continue to echo, sound strangely like harmony. Guillermo Gomez-Pena and his collaborators blend the boundaries of gender, sexuality, religion and violence, until world and character are indiscernible from one another. There is no real plot, nor can the individual moments of the piece be called episodes. It runs on a momentum all its own, and builds to powerful moments of self–reflexive and terrifying humor.

The show begins with a ten minute prologue of music and movement. Center stage, in wheel chair and wearing various metallic braces, is Gomez-Pena as Mexterminator — an ethno–cyborg. To his left is Sara Shelton-Mann as La-Clepto–Mexican, wearing a mustache, wielding a sword, and dancing to the ethno–techno. To Gomez-Pena's right is Juan Ybarra as Generic Alien, clad in green body make-up and wearing a mask straight out of the American psyche. Finally, on top of a black pyramid, sitting under a crucified skeleton, is Roberto Sifuentes, Cyber Vato, wearing jeans and a tee shirt. He is carefully wrapping himself in black cable while Gomez-Pena drinks from a whiskey bottle. They dance and writhe to the continually changing soundscape of Rona Michele, who is costumed in a yellow radiation suit. The lights melt and flash, while black and white pop–culture images trip and fade on a large movie screen. The spectacle is almost too much to bear.

The piece moved on, combining ideology and action, control and frenzy, humor and terror, performance and interaction, in a wide sweep of human experience. BORDERscape 2000 makes you feel as if you are tapping into the minds and thoughts of everyone around you at the same time.

As the hour comes near to completion, all attention turns toward the ending. The piece needed to provide a certain sense of artistic closure, without canceling the incentives for later change. Throughout the show, they have completely ignored five or six dead chickens hanging from the grid. From time to time, you can't help but wonder what is going to be done with them. I feared that their one purpose was to simply hang there, as an image of the gallows; but we were not disappointed. Roberto Sifuentes, in blind rage, mashes the chicken into the stage floor with a police baton. This mutilation goes on for a good five minutes. The audience was both silent and repulsed. Then, in a moment of extreme tenderness, Sifuentes picks up the matted chicken and holds it to himself as if it were his child. In the background, a live opera singer belts out a sad aria. Absolute drama!

The stage darkens. The final moment: a young boy walks out on stage in army fatigues and yells out, "Mommy?" He finds his mother in the audience, smiles, and then points a gun at her. The lights fade, and Generic Alien, glowing in the dark, hangs crucified from the cross.

This show has become the standard of imagination for me. The world is both dark and whimsical; all things are funny, and the funnier they are, the more serious they prove to be. Once the dizziness of the visual and linguistic volleying subsides, there is only the obscure sense of something stirring.

QB's shuffled, Broncos undefeated

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

Tony Banks had a good game for the St. Louis Rams and Pittsburgh's Kordell Stewart continued his climb back to where he was last season.

But New York's quarterbacks regressed. Danny Kanell of the Giants and Glenn Foley of the Jets got only one break: The Yankees are in the playoffs, reserving the back pages and the call-in lines for baseball.

That's somewhat typical in a league where half the starting quarterbacks have three years or less of experience at No. 1 and many backups should be third-stringers.

So every Sunday, we get inconsistency or worse, like the travails of Kanell and Foley, plus the misadventures of erstwhile third-stringers Donald Hollas for Oakland and Trent Green for Washington.

Hollas, filling in for Jeff George against Ryan Leaf and the Chargers, was 12-of-31 for 101 yards and the Raiders punted 16 times, one short of the NFL record.

So it was left to 39-year-old Wade Wilson to pull out a 7-6 win for Oakland on a 68-yard TD pass to James Jett with 1:28 remaining. By that time, Leaf was on the bench for the second time in three weeks after going 7-of-17 for 78 yards with three interceptions. Green's misfortune was symbolized by one series after an offside in the Winless Bowl, which his Redskins lost 17-12 to the Philadelphia Eagles.

On first-and-15, Green missed a handoff to Terry Allen, followed Allen into a hole and gained 8 yards.

On second down, he tripped going the other way and lost 11 yards.

On third down, he was sacked and fumbled, setting up Philadelphia's first touchdown.

In the second half, Norv Turner replaced Green with Gus Frerotte, who was yanked after two straight interceptions in the opener. Frerotte gets the start in Minnesota next week.

Here's a telling stat:

After six weeks, there are 11 NFL teams two games over .500 or better. Seven have quarterbacks 30 or older, most of them well over 30. Those seven (John Elway, Dan Marino, Steve Young, Chris Chandler, Randall Cunningham, Troy Aikman and George) have a total of 89 seasons of NFL experience.

Add Seattle's 41-year old Warren Moon and Doug Flutie of Buffalo, who will turn 36 in 10 days; 36-year-old Bubby Brister, who filled in admirably for Elway when he was hurt; and 32-year-old Jason Garrett, filling in for the injured Aikman, and it sure looks like an old guy's position.

The young guys on winning teams?

Brett Favre, Drew Bledsoe and Mark Brunell, three stars in their prime, plus Elvis Grbac, who needs to stay healthy. The 30-year-old George — yes, the Raiders are 4-2 — always had the talent, but not the temperament.

Of the youngsters, Peyton Manning looks like he'll be all right. He makes good plays and bad ones, but he's improving every week. Leaf, however, has had four straight horrible games and it doesn't help his confidence that Kevin Gilbride has been willing to lift him.

Bills' Flutie proves he is not too small in win

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. (AP) — Rob Johnson may be the Buffalo Bills' quarterback of the future. At the RCA Dome in Indianapolis on Sunday, Doug Flutie was the quarterback of the moment.

If Johnson is the franchise, Flutie is the corner store. For years and years the 5-foot-10 Flutie — every backyard quarterback's hero — heard the same thing: You're too small, too small, too small.

Even when it wasn't worded exactly that way, that's what it always sounded like to him. But on Sunday, the 35-year-old got a big chance to prove he can play. And he made the most of it. After Johnson, who led the team to an upset of San Francisco the week before, was injured early against the Colts, Flutie led the Bills (2-3) to a 31-24 victory.

Flutie was 23-of-28 for 213 yards and two touchdowns with no interceptions. He also rushed for 23 yards and avoided getting sacked.

As good as Flutie looked on paper, though, he looked even better on the field. He scrambled, he ran, he passed. He made things happen. On this day at least, nobody told Flutie he was too small to be a quarterback in the NFL.

Certainly not Bills coach Wade Phillips.

"Doug had an outstanding game," said Phillips, who noted that on a couple of occasions when Colts quarterback Peyton Manning had his passes batted down Flutie jokingly yelled, "He's too short! He's too short!"

The Colts found out Flutie was tall enough, thanks. He found eight receivers including Andre Reed, who lugged his injured shoulder into the game and made five catches. Flutie's 24-yarder to Reed helped set up the Bills' first touchdown, a 7-yard pass to tight end Jay Riemersma in the second quarter.

After stints with the Patriots and Bears and eight Canadian Football League seasons in which he captured the league's Most Outstanding Player award an unprecedented six times, Flutie decided to give the NFL another try.

Despite the fact he led the CFL in passing while leading Toronto to its second straight Grey Cup title in 1997, the NFL welcomed Flutie with an upturned nose.

The Bills acquired Johnson from Jacksonville for a first-round draft pick, and immediately named him the starter, even though he had started just one NFL game. Flutie, who had hoped the position would be fought for in camp, was left to battle for the backup spot.

Flutie accepted his role with a minimum of grumbling, and waited. But not for long.

Johnson was knocked out in the second half of the season opener at San Diego. Flutie, making his first NFL appearance in this decade, threw two touchdown passes and drove the team within field goal range only to have Steve Christie miss.

Don't look for a quarterback controversy in Buffalo. The Bills say they like both.

"They bring different things to the table," said receiver Kevin Williams, who made three catches including a 6-yarder for the go-ahead touchdown in the third quarter.

"We could sit here and go back and forth all day about how the tempo changed when Flutie got in there and try to start a controversy," Williams said. "But both of them are good quarterbacks, and both can make big plays."

Flutie, the Heisman Trophy winner in 1984, missed a night of studying the game plan Friday when he flew to Boston College to attend his alma mater's ceremony to retire both his jersey and that of nose tackle Mike Ruth, who won the Outland Trophy as the nation's best interior lineman in 1985.

The Massachusctts men's basketball team will kick off its 1998-99 season this Friday night at midnight with Midnight Madness at the Mullins Center. Admission to this event is free and tickets can be picked up either at the Curry Hicks Cage or at the UMass Campus Center. Tickets will also be available at the Mullins Center on Friday night.

Each player on the team will be introduced, and there will also be giveaways as well as a fireworks display.

the two-goal advantage.

"At the start of the third period they really came at us, but Markus made a few key saves in that first five to seven minutes," Mallen said. "Markus takes up a lot of room in the net, and he has a chance to be a real good goalie in our league."

Junior assistant captain Jeff Blanchard upped the UMass lead to 3–0 at 4:40 of the final frame. He gathered a pass from Jeff Turner and slipped one through Richard's five-hole.

Sophomore Kris Wallis then closed out the UMass scoring at the 5:35 mark of the third. The Aggasiz, British Columbia product fired a shot across the grain and found the bottom left corner of the net. Jay Shaw and Nick Stephens both assisted on Wallis' goal.

"Obviously we're really happy to get off to such a good start," Mallen said. "We did some good and some bad things, but it was nice to see the young kids get a taste of what college hockey is really like."

UMass will now face a stern test in its season opener on Saturday night when they will travel to East Lansing, Mich. to face Michigan State. The Spartans are coming off a 33–6– 5 season in 1997–98, and are ranked fifth in the preseason United States College Hockey Online Poll.

eight digs.

"Lymarie did a good job for us," Kenny said. "I would have liked to see more kills from 10 swings, but she hit better and dug the ball really well. She also passed really well during the match."

Coach Kenny also commented on the play of some of the regular contributors such as Jennifer Drennan, who had three defensive digs; Lauren Vander Veen, who had four kills and a .333 attack percentage and Celia Wiste who also had three digs on six swings.

"Jenny Drennan passed really well for us, Lauren also played better and Celia played well for us off the bench, which was really nice," Kenny said.

Another one of the unsung heros for UMass was freshman setter Heather Holtsberg. Last week's Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week had 34 assists in helping to lead UMass to the win.

"Heather is getting better," Kenny said. "She was thrust into a tough role as a freshman. She is expected to run this offense and she's doing a good job. Holtsberg has shown more variety on her sets and is establishing a tempo and a rhythm, which comes with every game she plays."

The Minutewomen will next have to face a huge test this weekend as Dayton and Xavier will arrive to take on UMass at Curry Hicks Cage.

an eight-goal offensive output, and Shea took advantage of the opportunity to play her entire bench.

"It was nice for everybody to see action," Shea said. "But La Salle is a good team. Our shots were just falling today."

They fell first for Erica Johnston, who redirected a Kate Putnam feed over Explorer goalie Lindsay Block's right shoulder to the top corner of the net under five minutes into the game.

Johnston would score twice more in the second half, with her final goal coming on a diving backhand shot to the opposite corner.

Kristen Schmidt took a Johnston feed past Block to the lower right corner to put UMass up 2–0 before Kerry Lyons closed out the first half by scooping the ball over Block while on the ground.

In the second half, Lucy Koch, Anke Bruemmer and Chrissy Millbauer all pocketed goals to up the Minutewoman advantage.

Millbauer and Koch scored unassisted tallies, while Bruemmer connected on a penalty corner.

The Minutewomen's next challenge will be against Syracuse when the Orangewomen visit Garber Field at 3 p.m. today.

"Syracuse's goalie is hack and their forwards are fast," Shea said. "Their defense is tough. And they play in the Big East, where every game is a challenge."

Men's tennis falls to in-state opponent

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

The first loss is always the worst. It leaves a bad taste in your mouth, and leaves you hungry for a chance to avenge it. The Massachusetts men's tennis team discovered that this weekend.

The UMass squad suffered its first setback of the season in the form of a 4–2 loss to Boston College. The loss dropped the Minutemen to 2–1 on the season. The Eagles were victorious at the number one seed and showed some depth with wins at the three through five seeds. Doubles matches were not played due to adverse conditions.

Senior Todd Cheney won for UMass at the number two seed in straight sets 6–4, 7–5. Cheney, the lone senior on the team, was able to maintain his poise on the road and record a win.

Sophomore Josh Bainton also notched a win at number six singles in straight sets 6–3, 7–6. This was Bainton's first victory as a Minuteman. The number six seed has been a very productive position for UMass, as it has take two of three possible points thus far.

The match hinged on a tightly contested battle at the number four singles which pitted Massachusetts junior Parsa Samii against BC's Jason Cowett. Cowett took the first set 6–1, but Samii battled back to win the next 6–3 and force the pivotal third set. Cowett outlasted Samii 7–5, giving the Eagles the 4–2 victory.

UMass' number three seed Fabian Rabanal also saw his undefeated team singles record shattered at the hands of the Eagles. Rabanal fell in two sets 6–2, 6–4.

UMass head coach Judy Dixon has stressed the importance of her team winning at the four through six singles positions, something that did not happen against Boston College.

"In order for UMass to win we must win at four through six," Dixon said.

Before the season began, the Minutemen had singled out this match as one of the key matches of their season, but the Eagles played tough at home in the comforts of Chestnut Hills. BC was able to avenge a 4–2 loss to UMass last season. That loss came here in Amherst though. This loss to Boston College puts the Minutemen at 2–0 at home but only 0–1 on the road. This is a frightening statistic considering that the vast majority of their schedule has them facing tough road opponents.

The maroon and white looked to change their early season road woes on Saturday with a contest against the University of Connecticut. UConn is undefeated with a string of one– sided victories. The match was rained–out and rescheduled for today in Connecticut.

Bruins nab win with Dafoe as savior

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Bruins coach Pat Burns was upset even though his goaltender played a brilliant game. New York Islanders coach Mike Milbury was upbeat even though his team remained winless with a 3-0 loss yesterday.

"That's because New York had outplayed, outshot and outhustled Boston but, for the second straight game, was victimized by a brief lapse.

"We were much better," Milbury said. "We clearly outplayed them for most of this game."

The difference was Bruins goalie Byron Dafoe, who made 28 saves, including three difficult ones in the last five minutes.

"Other individuals on this club are going to have to realize that we can't depend on him every night," Burns said. "We were outworked. There seems to be a lack of urgency in certain things we do."

The Bruins were good enough in a two-minute stretch of the first period to take advantage of Islanders' breakdowns and get goals from Dmitri Khristich at 14:00 and Steve Heinze at 15:18. P. J. Axelsson finished the scoring with 6:35 left in the game.

"The way the game is being played these days," Heinze said, "the lead is a big thing because everybody's so tough defensively so getting an early lead really helps."

On Saturday, the Islanders allowed three goals in a 72-second stretch of the first period and lost their season opener to the Pittsburgh Penguins 4-3.

Dafoe, who had a career-high six shutouts last season, started the 1998-99 season with a strong game in Saturday night's 3-3 tie against the St. Louis Blues. Yesterday, nothing got by him while three of Boston's 17 shots passed New York goalie Tommy Salo.

"I definitely had to work for it," Dafoe said. "In some shutouts I had last year I was just going through the motions."

"With about five minutes left, he stopped Jason Dawe's point-blank shot from the slot with his left glove, then smothered Sergei Nemchinov's rebound attempt on which. Dafoe said, "I just threw my glove out. He had the whole net. If he goes upstairs, it's in."

With 2:20 remaining, he poked the puck away from Mike Watt on a breakaway.

"We had a pretty good game," New York's Mariusz Czerkawski said, "but we have to be hungry."

Dafoe, obtained from the Los Angeles Kings in August 1997, had an outstanding first season with the Bruins with a career-high 65 games and a career-low 2.24 goals against average.

Khristich, Boston's second leading scorer last season, had missed Saturday's game with a sprained shoulder. Yesterday, he gave the Bruins the lead when he slid a 5-foot wrist shot by Salo after taking a pass from behind the net from Jason Allison.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Now is no time to beat around the bush. Thoughtfully and efficiently speak your mind today.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may feel that your communication with others is fine at this time, but that might not be the case. Think before you speak.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You can do much to ease someone else's discomfort today. Whether it's physical, psychological, or emotional, you'll know how to "fix it."

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Focus on the things that promote peace and harmony in your daily life. Also, seek some private space today.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You can promise someone else the world today, but it'll only be a disappointment if you're not willing to "go the distance."

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may be surprised at the way someone else makes you feel today. It's time for a change or two!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Although you feel as though a wrong decision was made, today's events will prove otherwise.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Focus on someone else's requests and needs today. Be kind, generous, and considerate of others.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Be wary of boosting someone's hopes so high that you're unable to meet their expectations. Be realistic.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Enjoy the ride provided by a friend today. The rewards stemming from it will have long-lasting benefits.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may feel like there's only one road to traverse today, but you're overlooking many valuable side-trips. Don't miss out!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Thanks to a friend who knows just what you need, you'll be in for a good time today. Open your mind.

UM football able to tip away JMU

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

One thing certain in the 28-26 victory of the Massachusetts football team, was the electricity of the crowd.

Those at the full Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium stood on their feet. A close game, a big day and the audience got the result that they had hoped for in a Minutemen victory.

That electricity, though, could not be equalled in the locker room.

Massachusetts 28
James Madison 26

Holding a 28-12 lead early on in the fourth quarter, it took a tipped pass in the final moments of the game by safety Brian Smith to salvage the afternoon. Not a blowout, or even a stellar performance, but at the very least, a victory for the Minutemen.

The game came down to a two-point conversion attempt by JMU. Down two with under a minute to play, Dukes' quarterback Greg Maddox, already with 265 yards passing, would turn to the air again to knot the game up. He went to his third option, wide receiver Marc Bacote, after options one and two, Earnest Payton and Craig Akins, were covered. The pass went over the middle to Bacote, who ran parallel to the end line to his left, but could not handle the throw after Smith was able to get his fingers on it.

Payton was the obvious choice. The sophomore wide receiver had notched 13 receptions on the day for 155 yards. On the final play, though, Payton was triple-teamed.

The opportunity for JMU to tie was only as a result of the second missed field goal on the day for Minuteman placekicker, Matt Murphy. After missing a 40-yarder in the first half, Murphy missed wide left a second time with 2:55 to play to keep it a one possession game.

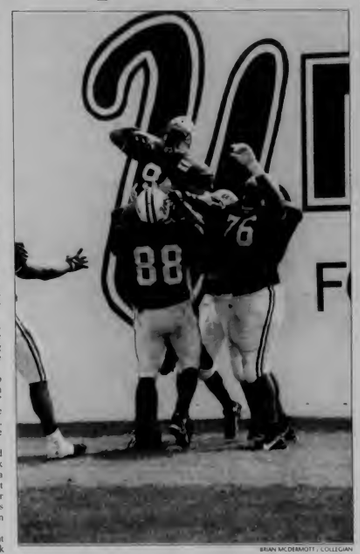
What would have been a chip shot for Murphy turned into a test when tackle Mim Hill had an unsportsmanlike conduct penalty called on him at the JMU 12-yard line, sending UMass back 15 yards.

"I won't say we were lucky," coach Mark Whipple said, "but if you keep putting yourself in these situations, you're going to get bitten in the rear. I'm hoping this teaches them a lesson."

With the win, the Minutemen moved up six spots to 18th in this week's Sports Network Division 1-AA poll.

JMU's final march spanned only two minutes, as the Dukes drove 80 yards, concluding the march with a 9-yard scoring run by running back Delvin Joyce, who compiled 104 yards rushing in replacing starter Curtis Keaton.

UMass got another phenomenal performance from running back Marcell Shipp, who came up with 190 yards and a touchdown. It was evident in listening to Whipple what role Shipp played in the grand scheme of things.



"Nobody really stepped up except for [Marcell]," Whipple said. "He goes hard every play, every time in practice, and he is a real winner. I don't think there's any doubt that [he] was the difference for us in the game."

And if he wasn't, it was Smith, who, in addition to the pass deflection on the conversion attempt, nullified a long JMU drive with an interception in the end zone.

"We needed someone to come up and make a big play and Brian Smith...came up with the play," Whipple said about the sophomore strong safety. "He's a tremendous kid, a great student, and a winner all the way."

Quarterback Todd Bankhead opened the scoring with a 1- yard quarterback keeper, and later hit Jimmy Moore for a touchdown, but otherwise, had what would be considered an average day for the junior, completing 11 of 23 passes for 187 yards, with an interception mixed in.

UMass, now atop the conference at 2-0, will test their offense next week against the conference's highest scoring team, the No. 15 UConn Huskies, in Storrs on Saturday.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts football team moved to 4-1 on the year with their win over James Madison this past weekend. Next up for the Minutemen is a visit to Connecticut to face the Huskies of UConn on October 17.

Men's soccer finally gets their first win

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team was able to get a giant monkey off their back, as they defeated George Washington 1-0 on Friday before falling to Virginia Tech 2- 1 in double overtime Sunday.

The Minutemen (1-9-2, 1-3-1 A-10) ironically got their first win without one of their players even scoring a goal as they were credited with a tally via an own goal at the 53:00 minute mark.

Moments before the score, a GW defendcr and Minuteman forward Mike Ianusz were chasing a 50-50 ball on a counterattack approaching the top of the GW box.

As Janusz and the defender were tussling for the ball, GW goalkeeper Michael Jelencovich came off his line, and attempted to clear the ball. After Jelencovich played the ball, the ball hit Janusz in the back as he was moving away from Jelenocvich. After hitting Ianusz, the ball rolled backwards approximately 17 feet into the open net.

From there, UMass keeper Todd Fowler guided the team to their first win of the season by stopping everything that came his way.

Fowler earned his tenth career win and fourth shutout, as he made six saves for the game. Perhaps the most impressive save came as he made a diving stop on a 25-yard shot fired by Ben Hatton in the 36th minute of play. Jelencovich made six saves as well, with GW outshooting the Minutemen 11-7.

Unfortunately, however, the positive energy UMass took with them to Virginia Tech on Sunday was not enough for the Minutemen to build a winning streak.

Tech improved to 6-6-1 after they recorded the win over UMass via a Stanislav Licul goal at the 114:13 mark in double overtime. The score was Licul's sixth of the season, and he was clearly the player UMass hoped would not get the best of them.

The scoring started off on a positive note for UMass, as Adam Black netted his first goal of the season at 77:02. Blacks's contribution came on a penalty kick, that he placed by Hokie goalkeeper Alexey Salmin.

"It was nice to get the team on the board," Black said. "But we really needed to come away with two wins this weekend, so it was disappointing overall."

After Black's goal, the Minutemen let another lead slip away as Matt Whalen kicked in a rebound off a Licul shot at 86:44.

Both teams were then held scoreless for the rest of regulation and UMass entered into its fifth overtime game of the season.

After a scoreless first overtime session, the game headed into the final period where Licul was able to break through with the game winner.

"Getting our first win will hopefully serve as a building block for us the rest of the way," Black said. "We can still make a run and finish strong in the A-10."

Doctors say alleged Nazi fit to testify

VILNIUS, Lithuania (AP) — A court-appointed panel of doctors has ruled that Aleksandras Lileikis is fit to stand trial on Nazi war crimes charges, but warned that the stress of court proceedings could endanger his life.

Monday's ruling left in doubt whether the 91-year-old former Massachusetts resident will be brought to trial. Attempts to start proceedings against him on charges of genocide have repeatedly been delayed and many critics contend Lithuanian authorities are hoping Lileikis will die before a trial starts.

The trial was supposed to begin in mid-September, but Lileikis' legal team said he was too ill to appear in court. Lithuanian law does not allow trial in absentia for medical reasons and the court ordered a panel of doctors to assess his health.

Lileikis was head of the security police in the Lithuanian capital during the 1941-44 Nazi occupation. He is charged with ordering the arrests of scores of Jews and turning them over to a Nazi execution squad. About 90 percent of Lithuania's 240,000 Jews were killed during World War II.

Temporary teaching licenses proposed

BOSTON (AP) — A proposed amendment to state law would allow teachers who have licenses from other states and three years of experience to teach temporarily in Massachusetts.

The proposal would grant them temporary teaching certificates, and give them one year to pass the new Massachusetts teachers tests.

The idea has the backing of state Education Commissioner David Driscoll.

School districts in the state received applications during the summer from experienced teachers certified in other states. But teachers must pass the Massachusetts tests to be certified to teach in public schools here.

"The problem we have is that you can't hire them until they get certified, and the test may be months away from when you need them," Peter Finn, executive director of the Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents, told the Boston Herald. Driscoll said superintendents told him they had found qualified teachers, but they had to take the state teacher tests.

"We'd like to be able to give them a year to take and pass the certification test," he said.

At a Board of Education meeting yesterday, board members agreed to ask Amherst-based National Evaluations Services, which administers the test, to give it more frequently so out-of-state teachers have more chances to take it.

Cellucci-Harshbarger debate at Mullins Center

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Acting Governor Paul Cellucci and State Attorney General Scott Harshbarger are gearing up for the gubernatorial debate to be held tonight at 8 p.m. at the Mullins Center, in the VIP room.

The two candidates are expected to highlight their views on public higher education. Both candidates support the Massachusetts higher public education system.

Harshbarger charges that the Weld/Cellucci administration has terribly underfunded the public higher education.

"Access to higher education is key and right now Scott Harshbarger is the only one that seems to be listening to us," said Toby Chaudhuri, president of the Massachusetts College Democrats, and spokesperson for the Harshbarger Campaign.

Cellucci, however, announced today to the Board of Higher Education that he plans to cut tuition at community colleges by 10 percent and tuition at state colleges by five percent and recommended that the UMass Board of Trustees adopt a five percent cut in tuition for the 1999-2000 school year.

"Massachusetts is leading the nation in lowering tuition for students who need it most," said Cellucci in a press release. "Every student should have access to a quality college education and these tuition cuts will help them have one."

Harshbarger's platform for UMass and other public institutions includes reconstructing University facilities, increasing expenditures for faculty, as part of the UMass budget, and guaranteeing sufficient funding for UMass in the state budget to keep UMass up to par with private state universities.

The Cellucci platform for higher education also includes various plans pertaining to UMass. Cellucci announced a plan yesterday to add an additional $8 million for scholarships at state college and universities. He also proposed cuts in fees for public campuses; tuition costs are expected to drop as well.

"Investing in the education of our children is an investment in the future of Massachusetts," said Cellucci. "Any student who wants a college education should have access to one, regardless of their financial situation. We want to make that possible."

"Governor Cellucci has helped increase the standards at UMass. He knows UMass is a great school and is doing everything to make it better," said Shawn Feddeman, spokesperson for the Cellucci Campaign.

Representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst) has been a champion of higher public education in the legislature, according to the Harshbarger campaign.

"The Weld and Cellucci administrations have grossly underfunded the UMass line item in the budget ever since I've been in office," said Story. "It has been up to the Democratic legislature to pump up funding for higher education each year.

"In the last three years alone, we have had to add a total of $290 million to what the Governor proposed for the University line item. We simply cannot count on acting Governor Cellucci to do the right thing for students and public higher education."

But Cellucci announced yesterday that he will propose an 11 percent increase in his budget later this month, bringing the total scholarship budget to $82 million for next year.

Harshbarger's position is to bolster higher education and job growth in the Commonwealth. He plans to offer student loan credits to Massachusetts college graduates who remain in the state to live and work.

Cellucci also proposed an additional $11 million for the endowment college

Students angry with debate setup at Mullins

By Julie Fialkow

Due to lack of tickets, no formal representation of the undergraduate student body will be present at tonight's gubernatorial debate.

Massachusetts attorney general Scott Harshbarger, and acting governor Paul Cellucci, candidates for the 1998 gubernatorial election will visit the VIP room today at the Mullins Center as one of their campaigning stops.

A meeting was held last night in the Radical Student Union office to plan a protest of the debate.

Jesse Burchfield, attorney general of Student Government Association, said the protest, at 7 p.m. in front of the Mullins Center, is due to the lack of formal undergraduate representation at the debate.

"Both candidates got 61 tickets each; basically their cheerleaders," Burchfield said. "How are you going to go to UMass and not allow students to be there?"

According to Burchfield, the nearly 100 remaining tickets available were divided up by the Center for Public Policy and media consortium, the co-sponsors of the event. 25 tickets are going to trustees, 20 to the legislature, 10 to the media, 10 to campus administration, 20 for the Center for Public Policy (made up of faculty and graduate students), and four were given to William Bulger, president of the University, said Burchfield.

Satu Zoller, associate director of the Center, said they weren't expecting the candidates to take so many tickets. The

Two rapes on campus

Two incidences of acquaintance rape — both of which occured in the Southwest Residential Area — were reported over the long weekend to the University of Massachusetts police department.

Police received a report of an acquaintance rape at 9:04 p.m. on Monday, Oct. 12, according to the UMass Police Log.

A second incidence of acquaintance rape was reported to police on Oct. 11. The sexual assault took place on Oct. 8, according to the police log.

UMass Chief of Police John Luippold would not release the exact location of the incidents, "in respect to the confidence of the victims," however both incidents occured in the Southwest area.

Police have not made any arrests, Luippold said, and are continuing to investigate both assaults.

Police investigating assault and battery

University of Massachusetts police are investigating an assault and battery that occurred in Washington Residence Hall on Saturday, Oct. 3.

Police are seeking witnesses and information regarding an "apparent group assault and battery" against an individual in the Southwest Residential Area during the afternoon of Oct. 3, according to Kay Scanlon of the UMass News Office.

According to a public safety alert released by the UMass police department, police are looking for anyone who may have any information on the assault or who may have observed a group of college age men entering or leaving Washington Hall between 1:30 p.m. and 2:15 p.m. on Oct. 3.

The victim of the assault received minor injuries, but was not hospitalized. The victim at first declined medical treatment, but was later persuaded to go to University Health Services, where the victim was treated for bruises and abrasions, Scanlon said.

"The University takes such incidents very seriously and will investigate [this incident] to the top of our ability," Scanlon said.

So far no arrests have been made. UMass Chief of Police John Luippold has assigned three officers to investigate the report of the incident and, "because of the apparent group nature of the assault," police have also contacted the district attorney's office, Scanlon said.

"The district attorney is concerned because of the group nature of the assault," Scanlon said.

"Some individuals have been helpful... [but] the investigation is open and ongoing," Luippold said. "UMass police and the district attorney's office are interested in identifying the suspects."

Individuals with information are urged to contact the Community Disorders Unit at 545-0893 or the TIPS Hotline at 577-TIPS (8477).

Charges upgraded to murder

By Robert W. Black
Associated Press

LARAMIE, Wyo. — The beating death of a gay University of Wyoming student inspired condolences from across the country, as President Clinton and activists asked lawmakers to give homosexuals the protection of hate-crime laws.

Matthew Shepard, 21, died at a Fort Collins, Colo., hospital Monday after spending several days in a coma. His skull was so badly fractured by the beating that doctors said they couldn't operate.

Shepard was found last Wednesday in near-freezing temperatures, lashed to a split-rail post outside Laramie.

"All gay people and lesbians have felt alone and under siege at times," gay activist Michael Weinstein told about 1,000 people attending a candlelight vigil in West Hollywood, Calif. "Thinking of him alone on that post,... it's just horrifying. He was so young. He had not yet had the chance to live."

Charges against Russell Arthur Henderson, 21, and Aaron James McKinney, 22, were upgraded late Monday following Shepard's death, the court clerk's office said today. Henderson and McKinney were charged with first-degree murder, aggravated robbery and kidnapping with intent to inflict bodily injury or to terrorize the victim. The murder count carries a possible death sentence; the prosecutor hasn't said whether he will seek the death penalty.

Charges against the men's girlfriends, Chasity Vera Pasley and Kristen Leann Price, were upgraded to accessory after the fact of first-degree murder. They were accused of helping their boyfriends get rid of bloody clothing.

At arraignment late Monday, the two men were ordered held without bond. Pasley, also arraigned late Monday, and Price, who was arraigned today, both had bond set at $30,000. Police said robbery was the main motive for the attack but that Shepard apparently was chosen in part because he was gay. Shepard had been beaten twice in recent months, attacks he attributed to his homosexuality.

Students rallied Monday in downtown Denver to remember Shepard. In Laramie, some students wore yellow and green armbands to send a message of peace.

Students attending a rally against a columnist who criticized gays in the University of Maryland campus newspaper observed 30 seconds of silence for Shepard. And in the Castro district of San Francisco, the giant rainbow flag that symbolizes the gay movement was lowered to half staff.

"Americans will once again search their hearts and do what they can to reduce their own fear and anxiety and anger at people who are different," Clinton said. "And I hope that Congress will pass the hate-crime legislation."

The Hate Crimes Protection Act would make federal offenses of crimes based on sex, disability and sexual orientation. Current law covers crimes based on race, color, religion or national origin. Of the 41 states that have hate-crime laws, 21 specifically cover offenses motivated by the victim's sexual orientation. Efforts to pass a hate-crime law in Wyoming have failed.

Shepard died just as Gay Awareness Week was starting in Laramie. "There's no way that can be overlooked," said Jim Osborn, who attended grade school with Shepard. "If his death leads to passage of hate-crimes legislation in Wyoming, it will be a bittersweet footnote in our state's history."

Meanhwile, the Rev. Fred Phelps, the leader of a Topeka, Kan., church whose members regularly engage in anti-homosexual picketing, said he was planning a demonstration at Shepard's funeral. Gov. Jim Geringer said he cannot stop Phelps from coming, but said precautions would be taken to make sure Friday's services aren't interrupted.

Geringer said Phelps' group is "just flat not welcome. What we don't need is a bunch of wingnuts coming in."

While friends and family planned memorial services, new details emerged about a second alleged attack by the suspects the night Shepard was lured from a campus hangout, robbed and beaten. Two Hispanic teen-agers said Henderson and McKinney ambushed them early Wednesday, cutting the scalp of one before the other retaliated.

Police Sgt. Jeff Bury confirmed that Henderson and McKinney were involved in an altercation with Emiliano Morales III, 19, and Jeremy Herrera, 18, both of Laramie.

The teens said they were walking to a park just after midnight — about an hour after investigators believe Shepard was assaulted — when two men suddenly appeared.

Both Morales and Herrera, who said they are not gay, did not hear any anti-Hispanic or anti-gay slurs, only cussing and what Herrera called "talking smack."

"Jeremy yelled, 'He's got a gun,' and he hit me in the head," Morales said. "Jeremy ran up and hit him with a stick and we took off."

Police responded to the fracas. During a court hearing Friday, the judge read from investigative reports that said police found a bloody gun and one of Shepard's credit cards in McKinney's truck. McKinney was taken to a hospital for treatment. Soon after, Morales needed 21 staples to repair his scalp.

UMass hockey squad wins exhibition opener

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

If there is one thing that Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen has preached to his team, it is the fact that it will take a team effort to win hockey games this season.

You won't see any All-America candidates or hired guns up front on the ice for UMass this season, but what you will see is a unit who is committed to winning hockey games together.

Mallen and the Minutemen went out and practiced what they preached in their exhibition opener on Friday night against Concordia College. Four different goal scorers contributed tallies and sophomore netminder Markus Helanen had 37 saves in a 4-0 victory over the Chiefs.

"There's no doubt [that this is the kind of effort we need every night]," Mallen said. "First, to get four goals was a good start, and then to get a shutout as well was great. This win will definitely build some confidence for us."

UMass opened the scoring at the 10:06 mark of the opening period. After an intense battle for the puck behind the Concordia net, sophomore Ray Geever gathered the disc and fed freshman Darcy King in the slot, who backhanded a shot past Benoit Richard for a 1-0 UMass lead. Jedd Crumb also assisted on King's goal.

The Minutemen added another goal just over three minutes later, as one of UMass' few upperclassmen lit the lamp. Junior center Nathan Sell grabbed a loose puck off a faceoff and snapped a quick shot past Richard for a 2-0 advantage.

The game remained at 2-0 in favor of the Minutemen until the third period, when UMass scored two goals in a span of 55 seconds to put the game away. Concordia threatened to cut into the Minutemen lead just prior to those two goals, but Helanen came through with several key saves to keep

Minutewomen split pair versus GW, Hokies

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

There's just something about Sundays that seem to bring out the best in the Massachusetts women's soccer team.

Thanks to a 5-0 shelling of Virginia Tech on Sunday afternoon at Totman Field, UMass (6-8, 3-2 in the Atlantic 10) upped its record on the first day of the week to a perfect 5-0 this season. The win over the Hokies also allowed the Minutewomen to rebound nicely from a tough 1-0 loss to George Washington on Friday afternoon.

Massachusetts 5
Virginia Tech 0

"We're 5-0 on Sundays this year, and that is a bizarre stat in itself," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We came out all revved up today because we were both embarrassed and humiliated with the loss on Friday."

Giving up the first goal has been a thorn in the side of the Minutewomen all season, and once again came to the forefront on Friday, when George Washington scored just under six minutes into the game and held on for a 1-0 win. Sunday, however, was a different story, as junior Cindy Garceau scored her first collegiate goal only 62 seconds into the match off a scramble in the box.

"It felt great to get the goal. That [scoring first] was important because it always seems like we are the ones we get scored on first," said Garceau. "It was nice for us to start out on top for once, and I think it brought the whole team up."

The hosts increased their lead to two goals a little over 20 minutes later, when freshman Kristi Robicheau grabbed a loose ball and fired a shot into the upper left corner of the net. The goal was also the first collegiate tally for the Marshfield native.

The scoring barrage continued about three minutes later, when senior co-captain Sophie Lecot knocked the ball out of the grasp of the Tech keeper and deposited a shot into an empty net for a 3-0 lead.

George Washington 1
Massachusetts 0

Lecot would then go on to add two more goals in the second half, finishing up with a hat trick in the shutout victory.

"Everyone came in focused today," said Lecot, who leads the team in goals [10] and points [24]. "After Friday we knew we had to move on. We knew we could do better, but it was just a matter of getting up and doing it."

The offense wasn't the only thing that went right for UMass on Sunday. The defensive unit also held the Hokies in check for the entire 90 minutes, and junior Angie Napoli recorded her first shutout of the year between the pipes.

"The defense did a great job of shutting them [Tech] down, and that made my life a whole lot easier," Napoli said. "I think it was the best game defensively we've played all season."

Rudy also agreed with his goalkeeper's statement.

"This was our best defensive performance of the year. We knew we couldn't relax because we knew they'd come at us with three front runners," he said. "I would say that ever since midway through the first half of the George Washington game that Tommy [sweeper Amanda Thompson] has got that group focused and organized, and even more so today with Sarah Cook going down."

UMass did lose Cook for the remainder of the game after she suffered an ankle injury midway through the first half. Although the initial prognosis was that there did not appear to be any broken bones, results from a more thorough examination were not available at press time.

The Minutewomen will now head to Ohio this weekend for a pair of A-10 battles with Xavier and Dayton. This weekend may prove to be the measuring stick determining whether or not UMass will earn a berth in the conference tournament to be held next month in Dayton.

The GW loss however, may have been the kick in the behind that the Minutewomen needed to head back in the right direction.

"We may not be a brilliant team, but we know that we have to work hard every game and be focused as well," Rudy said. "We've worked hard every game, but almost every time we aren't focused we tend to pay the price."

UMass downs Bonnies in three sets

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team came upon Reilly Center to face St. Bonaventure this past Saturday, knowing it was their last road match for a little while, but the thought of coming home didn't impede UMass from handing the 2- 13 Bonnies their 14th lost.

With the win, UMass improved to 8-9 overall, and 5-3 in the Atlantic-10 Conference. Of the Minutewomen's first 17 matches, 11 have been on the road. UMass was able to take five of those eleven road matches. They finished this stretch of the season by routing the Bonnies 15-5, 15-8 and 15-2.

"Against St. Bonaventure, we passed the ball really well, and served well," coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We were also bigger, stronger and more physical then St. Bonaventure. We also benefitted from their setters being very inexperienced."

Now UMass will have nine of their last 13 regular season matches at home. Curry Hicks Cage will be the stage for the Minutewomen's stretch run at the A-10 title.

"It's good to be home, feels like we've been living on the road. I'm glad we're back because we are in for a dogfight at the cage against Xavier and Dayton," Kenny said.

Junior middle blocker, Jill Meyers fired 13 kills, while carrying a hitting percentage of .400. Meyers also chipped in with four defensive digs as well.

"Jill played well and I'm glad that out of her 20 swings she got 13 kills, but against St. Bonaventure I would hope their are no hitting errors for anybody," Kenny said.

Junior outside hitter Kari Hogancamp came through again for UMass with a double-double. The Huntington Beach, Calif. native came through with 10 kills and 10 digs.

The Minutewomen also received solid play from Lymarie Llovet who had three kills and

UM sweeps in field hockey

By Casey Kane

According to Massachusetts field hockey coach Patty Shea, losses can be positive things, especially if necessary adjustments are made and wrongs are righted.

On the heels of Wednesday night's 3-0 loss to Boston University, Shea's team showed the power of turnaround this weekend, cruising to a pair of Atlantic 10 conference victories. UMass beat West Chester 3-1 on Friday night and trounced La Salle 8-0 Sunday.

"We learned a lot [in the last three games]," Shea said. "Losses can be hard, but they don't always have to be bad things. There can be positives from a loss."

There are also positives that come with wins. In UMass' case, a large plus from this weekend is the boost the Minutewomen received in conference play. West Chester falls to 0-2 in A-10 play, while the Explorers drop to 0-3 because of an earlier loss to Rhode Island.

"You have to take care of your conference," Shea said. "That is very important. It's our goal to be one of the top four teams in the A-10. Once you take care of the first three or four games in conference you can set new goals."

The teams who end the regular season among the top four advance to the Atlantic 10 tournament, from which the champion moves on to the NCAA tournament.

After getting shut out by the Terriers in the first field hockey game held under the lights at Richard F. Garber Field, the Minutewomen had no trouble producing offense this weekend.

Friday night, senior back Laura Phelan took care of a chunk of scoring with a pair of penalty stroke goals, the first coming after Golden Ram goalie Beth Steck trapped the ball in front of the cage with nine minutes remaining before halftime.

Sophomore Patty Robinson had knocked home the rebound of a save for the first goal of the game, just over three minutes ahead of her teammate.

Phelan notched her second of the contest on another stroke tally with 2:02 left in the game after a West Chester defensive error.

Sunday afternoon, UMass drilled holes in the La Salle defense with Student Affairs committee set to make recommendations next year based on findings

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

A committee to review the organization of the Office of Student Affairs will make recommendations next year as to whether or not it needs to be changed.

According to Margaret Jablonski, visiting assistant professor of education and chairperson of the committee, and Vachel Miller, support staff for education, the focus of this review is to determine how the students are impacted by the Office.

University of Massachusetts Amherst Chancellor David K. Scott sent a memorandum to the campus community last August stating that he was forming the committee based on advice he received after vice chancellor Tom Robinson's departure this year.

The committee consists of faculty and administration members, as well as six students, including Jodi Bailey, Jesse Burchfield, Brenda Fitzpatrick, Resa Singleton and student trustee Eleanor Court — all of the Student Government Association — and Kim Marcello, graduate student of the English department.

Jablonski said that Robinson, who was vice chancellor of Student Affairs for six years, looked within Student Affairs to see how it could be improved. The committee, on the other hand, Jablonski said, is "looking across the entire administration" to see if change is needed.

For example, Jablonski said, an incoming freshmen that plays for the football team has three places he or she could go to for advising and support: the academic support area for athletes, regular advising, and if the student was a person of color, he or she could go to another center for advising as well.

Jablonski said they are trying to coordinate these resources so that "students can get the best advice possible."

Jablonski said she has not yet had any direct feedback from students but both she and Miller emphasized they want the campus community to be involved.

Community meetings are planned for Tuesday, Oct. 27 and on Thursday, Nov. 5 in the Campus Center.

At these meetings, they said, the campus community can make comments and ask questions about the review.

Scott said in a memorandum that whatever "structure" that is decided to be used will go into effect September of next year.

The committee has to submit a report by Feb. 1. Jablonski said not all parts of the review will be completed until the end of the school year. She said this is because since there is so much in student affairs to review, not all areas of the Office of Student Affairs can be looked at in great detail before Feb. 1.

Microsoft makes detailed defense

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Days from its government antitrust trial, Microsoft Corp. issued its most detailed defense yesterday against charges it tried illegally to bully high-tech rivals and protect its lucrative Windows franchise.

In a 43-page report called "Setting the Record Straight," Microsoft dismissed claims that it acted illegally toward Intel Corp., Intuit Inc., America Online, Apple Computer Co. and Netscape Communications Corp.

Microsoft also asked a federal judge again yesterday to delay the trial, scheduled to begin next Monday, for at least two weeks, until Nov. 2.

It described its trial preparations as an "already intolerable burden" made worse by the government's "latest effort to sandbag Microsoft" by making last-minute changes to witnesses and trial exhibits.

In an unusual but anticipated move, the government also filed under seal and sent to Microsoft the written testimony of its dozen witnesses. To move the trial quickly, the judge previously ordered both sides to present testimony in writing, so witnesses will only be cross-examined during the upcoming trial.

The judge didn't order that the testimony be kept from the public before the trial. The government indicated yesterday it plans to release each person's testimony roughly the day before the witness is to be cross-examined.

The Justice Department didn't respond directly to Microsoft's report, which was posted on the company's Web site and distributed to news organizations.

"We're confident in the evidence in our case, and we look forward to bringing that evidence to trial," Justice spokesman Gina Talamona said.

In its essay, Microsoft offered new details about its dealings with Apple and about America Online's 1996 decision to adopt Microsoft's Internet browser over Netscape's, citing a previously unreleased e-mail exchange between Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates and AOL's chief, Steve Case.

The government has cited documents from Gates suggesting that America Online, the nation's largest Internet provider with more than 13 million customers, agreed to distribute Microsoft's browser software in exchange for including AOL's software within the Windows operating system.

The government, which will call an AOL executive as one of its witnesses, said Microsoft's browser was technically inferior to Netscape's but quoted Gates as saying his software was "good enough to be in the ballpark."

Microsoft yesterday cited e-mail from Gates saying AOL chose the company's browser because it could work seamlessly with AOL's proprietary software, discouraging customers from leaving the online service to surf the Internet.

■ committee

Within the committee, five sub-committees have been formed, under the titles of enrollment services, judicial system, academic support and advising, campus life, and auxiliary support. These sub-committees will have a "clearer focus," Miller said.

He also said the sub-groups will then report to the other members of the committee.

According to its review criteria, when examining an area, committee members are to consider its current organization, purpose, student needs, and its strengths, as well as any concerns for improvement.

When explaining any suggested changes, committee members are to consider the impact on students and its impact on connected areas.

Jablonski said she has trust in the student committee members' abilities and their insight.

"It's a lot of work [they are putting into this]," she said.

Singleton said she joined the committee because, in a way, it is part of her job description as SGA student coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) which is to make sure that the students aren't forgotten.

She said she hopes the outcome will "be beneficial for everyone and will be in everybody's best interest, especially the students."

■ debate

SGA was supposed to have 30-50 tickets to the debate. Zoller said they sent out invitations to the campus community before they found out the amount of tickets the candidates were actually requesting.

"We referred students who needed tickets to the campaigns," said Zoller.

But Bron Tamulis, SGA secretary for public policy and relations and member of the Radical Student Union, blames the candidates, and not the debate's organizers.

"There is no reason that family and political supporters should take precedent over students," he said. "They [the candidates] wanted the small space."

Zoller also said the limited amount of tickets available to the event is a consequence of the small size of the room.

A larger venue could not be used according to Zoller, because the Campus Center auditorium would not be able to accommodate the security needed, and Bowker Auditorium had been reserved.

Campus groups praise education bill

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

The re-authorization of the Higher Education Act signed last week by President Clinton is receiving praise from some campus groups.

The Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) and others spoke at a press conference last Friday in praise of the bill.

According to MassPIRG, students who apply for a consolidation loan from the Direct Loan Program before Jan. 31, of next year will have an interest rate of 7.46 percent. However, students enrolled in school that have an outstanding Perkins student loan do not qualify for the consolidation loan.

Jodi Bailey of the Student Government Association (SGA) said she encouraged students to apply for this loan.

Jason Vecchio of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) which is part of SGA, said that the press conference was a great opportunity to tell people about the changes enacted by the bill.

Vecchio said the new bill could "increase access to public higher education."

Vecchio said he is "very happy" with the signing of the bill.

"I'm glad that Congress has finally taken on the banking and loan industries," Vecchio said.

However, he said there was still a lot more to do.

"While financial aid is improving, students are still having trouble getting aid," Vecchio said.

And while he approves of the "recent curbed costs in public higher education in Massachusetts." The fees, he said, "are still ridiculous." Vecchio said the bill was a success, and that Clinton did well by signing it.

Michael Wisemen, director of the office of Greek Affairs on campus, also said he was pleased with the bill. He said when he reflects on his own school financial experience, he knows that it is much worse today.

Wisemen said that according to a recent CNN report, the average college student takes on $13,000 in loans.

In tandem with Congressional action, Massachusetts officials have been making recent changes in education. The Board of Higher Education recently made a recommendation to the Board of Trustees that non-residents of Massachusetts pay an 8.2 percent increase in their tuition, which amount to $720. In-state residents will get a percent decrease in tuition, which is about $90.

Bob Connolly, associate vice president of the University, said that although the school's tuition and fee rates were high at one point, after three consecutive tuition cuts, it is no longer the case.

"UMass is in the comfortable, middle range," he said. According to its data, UMass ranks 11th in the highest costing large public universities for 1998. It rated fifth in cost when compared to the other five New England state universities.

MassPIRG also said the bill will preserve and improve federal support for state grants to students, which will increase the amount of state resources invested into financial aid for students.

The bill will also require colleges and universities to provide a mail-in voter registration form to all students on campus, which MassPIRG said will "reduce one of the major barriers to registering students to vote."

MassPIRG also claimed that the bill's improvements in need-analysis will result in "fairer treatment for certain non- traditional and lower-income students."

According to MassPIRG, a performance-based organization will be created within the Department of Education which, if "implemented correctly, will vastly improve customer service for millions of students and families."

challenge, which urges schools to engage in fundraising. The program offers one dollar in state funds for every two dollars raised by the university. The endowment challenge has raised $44 million for colleges and universities in the last two years.

However, Harshbarger charges that Cellucci, through the gubernatorial administration, proposed a $20 million cut in higher education funding.

Cellucci has announced several initiatives to improve the quality of education and recruit better teachers. Details of Cellucci's plan include: Eliminating certifications of schools of education who fail to meet an 80 percent passing rate in the teacher exams, and demand at least a 90 percent passing rate by August 1, 2001. Cellucci also calls for universities to raise admissions standards for education student, offer free tuition for qualified undergraduates who decide to become teachers and encourage professionals with private-sector experience to become teachers by developing the "Pathways to Teaching Program."

"I will continue to demand high standards for teachers because the future of children depends on having the most prepared and qualified educators in our classrooms," Cellucci said.

Harshbarger's position on teacher testing is specifically geared towards training, as well as testing teachers.

Analysis of US, Cuban policy recommended

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger and Lawrence Eagleburger, citing a need for "an objective analysis" of U.S. policy toward Cuba, are urging President Clinton to authorize the creation of a bipartisan commission.

Joining Kissinger and Eagleburger in the effort are former Defense Secretary Frank Carlucci and former Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker, among others.

In a letter sent on behalf of the group, Eagleburger said the commission should be patterned after the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, which was created in 1983 when much of that region was engulfed in ideological warfare. That commission was chaired by Kissinger.

Eagleburger sent the letter to Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) who is spearheading a drive in the Senate to create a commission on Cuba. Warner told Clinton in a letter dated yesterday a comprehensive study of Cuba policy is needed because there has been none since 1960, when the United States first began restricting trade ties with Cuba.

Warner's letter recommended that the proposed commission study such issues as the national security risk of Cuba to the United States, compensation of U.S. business people whose properties were confiscated in Cuba and the domestic and international impact of the U.S. economic embargo against Cuba.

The embargo has been the centerpiece of U.S. policy toward Cuba for decades.

Three Cuban-American members of Congress, Reps. Lincoln Diaz-Balart (R-Fla.) Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., and Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) all recommended to Clinton that he reject the Warner proposal, calling it an "attempt to subvert the will of the American people and the intent of Congress."

The Cuban-American National Foundation, a Miami-based opposed to Cuban leader Fidel Castro, also rejected the proposal on grounds that a strong bipartisan consensus already exists on Cuba in the administration and in the Congress.

The foundation's Washington representative, Jose Cardenas, said the proposal was a clear attempt to ease U.S. policy toward Cuba although that goal was not stated explicitly in either the Warner or the Eagleburger letter.

"National public opinion polls indicate there exists no desire for the U.S. to indulge Fidel Castro," Cardenas said.

Difficult recovery for East Asia

By Jasmina Kuzmanovic
Associated Press

SINGAPORE — Warning of the risks of global recession, participants in the private East Asia Economic Summit adopted a plan yesterday for economic growth and reform of the world financial system.

The meeting of economists, businessmen and government officials asked the West to make significant cuts in interest rates and urged Japan to expand its money supply.

The plan calls on members of the Group of Seven major industrial nations to establish a new system for the monitoring, disclosure and regulation of highly leveraged short-term financial flows as well as derivative transactions.

Participants at the summit organized by the World Economic Forum, a private agency based in Switzerland, said they were "deeply concerned about the drift of the world economy and financial markets, and the growing risk of global recession."

The 15-point plan was put together by forum officials in consultation with speakers at the conference and other participants, and incorporates many of the themes brought up during the first two days of the conference, a spokeswoman said.

"Japan, as Asia's major high-income economy, with a GNP twice as large as all of the rest of Asia combined, has a special responsibility to help the region emerge from its current deep recession," they said in a statement.

Expressing their support for Japan's plan to provide $30 billion in assistance to crisis-stricken East Asia, the participants said Japan should be prepared to increase that sum, "perhaps significantly."

Europe, Canada and the United States should adopt significant tax cuts, and expand the provision of official loans and credit guarantees to the emerging markets in crisis, especially to cover necessities like food, energy and medical supplies, they added. The plan also called on East Asian countries to remain committed to further openness to foreign direct investment.

Commenting on what kind of new rules are sought for financial markets, the forum's managing director, Claude Smadja, said the aim was to curb "elements like volatile short-term financial flows and off-balance-sheet transactions."

These elements, Smadja said, "generate a lack of transparency and aggravate volatility of the financial market. ...It's like a time bomb waiting to explode."

Many at the gloomy conference have complained of a lack of leadership in dealing with economic crisis, and of slow recovery, delayed by political instability.

"In a severe crisis, countries, like individuals, become preoccupied with survival and become more self-centered and selfish," George Yeo, Singapore's second minister for trade and industry, told the meeting.

Thailand's deputy prime minister, Supachai Panitchpakdi, said the protectionist trend, coupled with a contraction of export markets as economies slow down worldwide, could hamstring the Asian recovery.

Almost everyone agrees on the restructuring that the crisis-hit Asian nations need to save themselves and stem the contagion, said Hubert Neiss, the International Monetary Fund's Asia-Pacific director.

But the dilemma is that the policy changes require strong political courage at a time when the economic changes themselves cause people to doubt their governments.

Balance sheets must be cleared of bad loans, insolvent banks closed, weak ones recapitalized, fiscal policy refocused on projects that encourage investment and create jobs, and social safety nets erected in Asian countries that did not have them before, Neiss said.

Plane crashes, killing one

By Derrill Holly
Associated Press

BOWIE, Md. — A plane for a traffic reporting service crashed yesterday into a suburban home in thick fog 14 miles east of the nation's capital, killing the pilot and critically injuring the reporter.

Two people in the house, which burst into flames and burned to the ground, escaped unharmed.

Killed was Douglas Duff, 42, an experienced pilot from Alexandria, Va., who was attempting an emergency landing at Freeway Airport when the plane crashed just before 7 a.m.

The reporter, Rob Edgar, 31, was in critical condition at Washington Hospital Center's Medstar burn unit. He was thrown from the plane when it crashed and suffered second and third degree burns over 40 percent of his body, a broken leg, pelvis and severe facial cuts.

"The weather conditions deteriorated rather quickly in the area," said Pete Pirringer of the Maryland State Police. "Weather was definitely a factor as well as some mechanical problems they are looking into," he said.

The plane "had no maintenance problems," said Monty Lillie, owner of Congressional Air Charters that owned the single engine Cessna 172-XP.

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian.

True stereotypes

Most individuals will agree that stereotypes are unethical and exist due to prejudices against and ignorance toward a specific group of people. This belief of stereotypes may be encompassed within the "In group/Out group" theory which suggests that people in power and in the majority get to decide who is "In" (normal and accepted) and who is "Out" (different and usually unequal). There is however another, considerably less popular belief which is the "Stereotypes exist because there is some truth to them" theory. I unfortunately belong in the latter group.

I specifically use the word "unfortunately" because I don't believe that stereotypes are particularly useful. However, that doesn't mean that I can simply will them away. My stereotypes exist because I have repeatedly encountered certain people who I can visually group together because they seem to behave similarly. I have set up a moral contradiction for myself here: I believe that stereotypes are wrong, but in my day to day life I find it difficult to escape them.

Lindsay McCarthy

For example, when I waited tables on the Cape during the summer I became aware of how certain groups of people treated me as their server. I noticed rather specific behavioral patterns almost immediately. After weeks of work I developed the ability to judge fairly accurately how a table was going to treat me and eventually tip me within the first five minutes of waiting on them.

There is the distinct possibility that after a few encounters with a certain group of people who acted similarly, I created a stereotype in my head that influenced my behavior from them on. This stereotype that I created might have given me a justification to treat certain groups of people in a specific way. Say, over the course of a week I waited on two separate groups of people with the same apparent ethnicity, and both parties left me meager tips. I might then be inclined to assume that everyone else of the same ethnicity would tip in the same unreasonable fashion and not treat them as well.

Of course, as a waitress I received an unbelievably low hourly wage because I was working solely for gratuities, so my paycheck depended on my tips. I could not afford to be prejudiced (at least outwardly) and disrespect the people I was serving or obviously they wouldn't tip me. I had no incentive whatsoever to be anything but efficient and pleasant to my tables, and I was.

There are of course many other stereotypes we face at UMass on a daily basis besides ethnic stereotypes, such as which residential area you live in ("she's one of those Southwest hoochies"), what your major is ("so you ended up a history major huh, —failed everything else?"), even which hometown you're from ("tough guy from Wuhstaah").

One stereotype that I've become acutely aware of is the "aren't you a trendy gen-X-er with your piercing!" Ever since I had my nose pierced I've received many open criticisms alluding to the fact that I'm either some kind of incompetent moron, or just that I'm an attention-crazed sicko. "Wow, that looks fine on you, I guess, but I'd NEVER do that to myself!" I suppose that I have also received many more silent criticisms that were considerably more harsh, but I'll never know. I'm not in any way insinuating that the prejudice against a piercing is in any way comparable to racism or bigotry, but it is one of the few areas where I personally have had to deal (unexpectedly) with ignorance and intolerance resulting from my (chosen) appearance.

So why haven't I learned that stereotypes are bad? Well, mainly because my daily experiences continue to reinforce them. I don't want to let my brain "compartmentalize" certain groups of people to help me "process" and automatically dictate how to act in certain situations, but I still do it everyday. What's worse is that my stereotypes are usually right. When there are a lot of drunken obscenities being screamed from Van Meter to my dorm at 9 p.m. on a weekday night I can guess that it's members of Group A being obnoxious again. When I'm in a dorm hallway and I smell bad schwag, I can guess that it's members of Group B going at it. When an (attractive young male) TA for one of my classes attempts to teach my lab something and I hear peels of inappropriate flirtatious giggling, I know they're from Group C; the list goes on and on.

"So why haven't I learned that stereotypes are bad? Well, mainly because my daily experiences continue to reinforce them."

This situation of being plagued by apparently accurate stereotypes is a difficult one to pose. Should I pretend that I don't see these clear trends under the guise of political correctness or at the very least because I consciously believe that they're wrong to possess? I want to believe that I try my best to treat everyone equally, but I do have to fight the tendency to shoot an annoyed glances at certain people as soon as they begin to exhibit a behavior I don't like that I've characteristically come to accept from them. Does that make me an evil person?

The idealistic answer is to treat everyone as individuals and not as some fraction of a larger whole. That's easy to say, but extremely difficult to act on. We should try and be aware of our prejudices and not to fool ourselves into thinking that we're some kind of an enlightened person without stereotypes. The line between how we believe we should act and how we actually act is never perfect. Constantly try to redefine it. For reasons beyond my control I'm sometimes unsuccessful, but I try.

Lindsay McCarthy is a UMass student.

One of best live acts in music today; ultimate party CD

COURTESY DANNY CLINCH

1965
The Afghan Whigs
Columbia

Over the last couple of albums, the Afghan Whigs, and especially frontman Greg Dulli, have found a way to dissect certain themes, and present them in cinematic grandeur. Gentlemen explored the mind of a sexual predator, with Dulli breathing lines like, "This ain't about regret/ My conscience can't be found." He fit the role perfectly with his swagger and bluster. The next album, Black Love, followed a criminal from committing his act to repentance.

And through these two albums, Dulli and the Whigs have created a following not built on shock, but on the fact that this is a band full of great musicians. This isn't Marilyn Manson, basing a musical career on face paint; their live act is one of the best in music today, with the band segueing gracefully from the Rolling Stones' "Gimme Shelter" into a medley of P.J. Harvey songs and back into one of their own numbers.

And after too long a wait, the Whigs have released a new album, the stellar 1965. Originally titled Stand Up to Get Down, this album seems to follow the arc of the previous two albums thematically. It's a study of sexual excess, although without the morality of Gentlemen (insomuch as the morality came from bad example, not preaching). 1965 seems to be following around a narrator who wants to have a good time. This time around Dulli's playing Jack Tripper, sizing up the crowd at the Regal Beagle. If Three's Company had been a Showtime Original Series.

As the original title suggests, the music is more groove oriented, falling away from the harsh, sonic-tinged hooklets, spirals that formed their older works' backbone. In addition, horns have been added (always a plus in my book), more organ is evident than in the past and soul singers have been added to the mix, as the band opts for more of the soul sounds they are so fascinated by, and do so successfully, without sounding like they are stealing something and making it bland (Cake is a good example of that).

Even without the discomfort of solo on "John the Baptist" ("I'd give anything to see you dance/ I'd give anything to see you smile") are inspired touches. B+ (Mike Messaros)

ALL DISCO DANCE MUST END IN BROKEN BONES
Whale
Virgin

Aside from having the best album title so far this year, Swedish pop outfit Whale have recorded the ultimate party CD. Not that this is the kind of music one would play at a party, but in the sense that the songs capture the feel of a party. With songs about being approached by someone and pretending to be interested in his pathetic life ("Losing CTRL"), trying to get back into a club at 5:30 a.m. ("Into the Strobe") and coming down from the affects of illicit substances ("No Better") the nightlife tone of the album is playfully set.

Vocalist Cia Soro carries most of the disc, along with guitarist Henrik Schyffert adding some welcome screaming. "Puma Gym" is a hook-filled delight, as is the first track "Crying at Airports." The disco-house ambience of the album adds to its flavor.

Whale's latest effort proves to surpass their previous work. With their first release since regrouping last year, Whale fashions a more than welcome return for themselves. A- (Kevin Monahan)

SMITTEN
Buffalo Tom
Polydor

I have this image of Buffalo Tom in my head, when they played Late Night with Conan O'Brien a few years ago. They were playing "Summer" off of their last album, Sleepy Eyed, and at one point, lead singer and guitarist Bill Janowitz reached over with his foot, trying to hit one guitar pedal from among the rows set out in his ungainly makeshift pedal box. There was this moment when everything could have veered off course: when he hit the wrong pedal and for one moment the sound of his guitar dropped out of the mix. But he finally found the reverb and, stepping on it, the band launched into the end of the song.

Buffalo Tom walks a tightrope between emotion and control, silly and serious. They are the guy at the bar, telling you more than you need to know about his life, but still affecting you nonetheless.

"Wherefore art thou, Johnny Carson?/ Retired, and never coming back," Janowitz sings on Smitten's second song, "Postcard." It's a strange line, and it comes out of nowhere, and as many times as I've listened to the song, I still don't know what it exactly means in the realm of the song. But it does leave the listener with a sense of abandonment (hey, I miss Karnac ...). Janowitz writes that way: disconnected lines float above the music, and you're not left with meaning, so much as a feeling. On "Scottish Windows," he sings "You need different boots in this country/ I see you through the screen door/ Abandoned, the birches bow/ You left me on the church floor." I can only guess what Scottish windows have to do with anything, but there's a real sense of wistfulness to the song, and the listener can't help but be drawn in.

There's this need to convey pure emotion, and while they achieve this through many of their slower songs, they still can do it on the faster tracks. "White Paint Morning," perhaps the best song on the album, relies on a buoyant "bop-bah-dah-dah" vocal melody from the outset of the song, while the album closer, "Walking Wounded" has a tired weary feel to it.

This isn't exactly a new Buffalo Tom. While there is a weird reverb sound and canned drum feel on "Knot In It," and "Scottish Windows" includes strings and piano, this is still Buffalo Tom: they don't necessarily reinvent the wheel. The album is produced gently and glossily, like the disappointing Big Red Letter Day, but still retains about of the glorious frayed edges of Sleepy Eyed (but not enough). As a result, the emotion of the band, unfortunately, feels hemmed in B (M.M.)

PROLONGING THE MAGIC Cake
Capricorn

Prolonging the Magic? Is that anything like "delaying the orgasm?" The latest release from one-hit-wonders Cake ("The Distance") is, to put it bluntly, excruciating. Did they stop to think how much these songs sucked before they even considered committing this trash to CD? The opening track, "Satan is My Motor" (not to be confused with Ministry's "Jesus Built My Hotrod") put-puts its way along and by the end of the song, the album runs out of gas. What lit-

ELECTION
Tom Perrotta
Putnam Books

Relatively few writers have captured that must elusive of adolescent experiences — high school. When they do try, it usually results in a collection of glossy ramblings in a diary and exaggerated stereotypes; the cheerleaders, the nerds, the jocks. There are a few exceptions, of course — perhaps The Breakfast Club and ABC's canceled series "My So-Called Life." But nothing as dark and disturbing as those four years sometimes were.

As Tom Perrotta's new novel Election points out, things aren't so nice and neat in the education system of America. This ain't Sweet Valley High.

Instead, Perrotta's characters are selfish, lonely and mostly, sex-obsessed. One teacher has an affair with a student. Another commits adultery and fixes a class election. The rest of the faculty members stand around naive, drink large amounts of coffee, and comment on the bodies of the teenage girls they "teach."

Those teens, though, aren't much better. Perrotta plays with the aforementioned stereotypes, but creates full-fledged personas of young adults with little direction and much confusion. The typical football jock, for instance, is actually an insecure, heartfelt young man deeply affected by his parents' divorce. His sister, a "dork," wrestles with her sexuality and extreme jealousy when her brother dates her ex-lover. If this all sounds like a bad soap opera, it isn't. It's depressingly real.

Sure, Perrotta still has some kinks to work out in his writing style — his dialogue is stilted, characters tend to sound the same, and he often tries to be too profound. But he has a clever, irreverent tone and a highly readable style; Election is related by a myriad of narrators, all in the first person, divided into very short, crisp sections.

Four of these storytellers, Tracy Flick, Paul Warren and Tammy Warren, are candidates in a class election and students at Winwood High. The author is at his best when he takes Tammy or Tracy's point-of-view, but struggles with the voice of Paul or anyone else.

Perrotta also has an alter ego in the primary narrator, Mr. "M.," a popular teacher and head of the election. In a sudden sweep of disgust, Mr. M. decides he is tired of selfish, aggressive people, tired of the corruption and fakery. He encourages the nice Paul to run against the favorite, Tracy, but in the process of his enlightenment, ruins the election and his marriage. His disgust turns into his own selfishness.

Most of the problem, the author implies, is based on our lack of control over personal, sexual desires. Perrotta sums it up best when he has a character say that sex causes strangers to become closer and friends to grow apart.

Friendships, marriages and jobs will be forever changed. Perrotta has the corruption of politics — and prophetically mentions Bill Clinton — in mind from the very first chapter, but his message is that everything begins to go wrong not in the adult world, but in the classroom. B

STRICTLY DIESEL
Spineshank
Roadrunner

Spineshank had so much press before their first album was to be released, it seemed impossible that they could ever live up to the hype. Billed as being a mix of the heaviness of Fear Factory and the emotion of the Deftones, Spineshank was even coached along by Fear Factory guitarist Dino Cazares from struggling L.A. club band to signing a multi- record deal with Roadrunner. With all these things going for them could Strictly Diesel be anything but the best record of the year? Well, yes.

That's not to say the album is not enjoyable, however. Throughout the generous 14 tracks of the debut, there are high points ("40 Below") and low points ("Slipper") Immediately noticeable on the opener, "Intake" is the talent of both guitarist Mike Sarkisyan and vocalist Johnny Santos. Memorable, heavy guitar riffs are characteristic of Sarkisyan on tracks like "Stovebolt" and "Where We Fall." Santos proves his worth with an excellent voice capable of reaching the speed and emotion of the Deftones' Chino Moreno, and the throat-tearing screams of Burton C. Bell of Fear Factory. Bell actually makes an appearance on the closing track "Stain (Start the Machine)," where he and Santos trade screams in a high-energy finale. Eventually though, you can start to identify the exact points where Spineshank is trying to sound like the bands they are influenced by, and you just wish they would start to develop their own sound. But with so talented a singer and strong tracks like "40 Below," Spineshank is guaranteed to win over even the most hardened cynics. Spineshank has a bright and hopefully more creative future ahead of them. B- (Michael Delano)

Massachusetts women's crew squad continues to be among nation's best

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's crew team is off to a successful fall campaign in hopes of building upon last season's fourth place finish at the NCAA championships.

The Minutewomen squad, which is comprised of around 120 athletes, has seen some of its both present and former members continue their activity in the water throughout the year.

UMass was well represented at the World Rowing Championships in Cologne, Germany over the summer. Alums Sara Jones, Wendy Wilhur, Deanna Groark, Michelle Berkhuis and Sara Lauritzen all took to the water for various nations with a common bond: ties to the Maroon and White.

As far as for the remainder of the fall season, the Minutewomen will head to Boston this weekend for the 34th annual Head of the Charles Regatta.

UMass will be represented for the second year in a row in the women's lightweight eight women Championship Open and Women's Open four with cox. Last year's women finished second to Denmark in the four and will be starting in the second place position this year.

Racing will run from noon to 4 p.m. on Saturday with an estimated 250,000 spectators expected in attendance.

Cheney leads UM tennis team

By Matthew Frascella
Collegian Staff

When a team is challenged early in its season it naturally must look to its seniors to lead by example and help to carry the load. On most teams this is not a problem, but for the Massachusetts men's tennis team the burden has fallen squarely on the shoulders of its sole senior, Todd Cheney.

Cheney won two times for the Minutemen, once in doubles and once in singles, to propel the UMass squad to a narrow victory on Monday over Boston University, 4-3. Cheney's doubles partner Parsa Samii also duplicated the same impressive feat.

Cheney dropped a close first set 7-5 before rebounding to claim the next two by scores of 6-4 and 6-1 respectively. The pairing of Cheney and Samii at number two doubles won 8-5. Samii also recorded a straight set victory over his Terrier opponent 6-3, 6-4.

UMass and BU split the singles points 3-3, leaving the match to be decided by the crucial doubles point. The Massachusetts team swept all three matches in doubles action to earn the win and boost their season record to 3-1 on the year. Victorious at number one doubles was the tandem of Rob Manchester and Bo Navarro who won 8-4. Josh Bainton and Todd Champeau also slated a doubles victory by a score of 8-5.

Fabian Rahmal returned to winning form with a clutch 7- 5, 6-3 straight set victory at the number three singles. The win improved him to 3-1 on the year at that seed and gave the Minutemen a vital singles point.

On a down note, UMass went out yesterday afternoon and fell to Connecticut 6-1. Cheney also proved to be the lone bright spot in that match, as he won in the number two singles position.

Next up for the Minutemen is a home match against St. John's University today at 3 p.m. on the Upper Boyden courts.

Western Conference:
Central: Detroit — They keep going and going.
Northwest: Vancouver — The Canucks get Trevor Linden back and Ziggy Palffy in the Bure deal, knocking off the Av's who are spiraling downward.
Pacific: Dallas — Hey, everyone else picked them and it's a mediocre division.

Western Conference Champs: Detroit
Eastern Conference Champs: Philadelphia
Stanley Cup Champ: Detroit — Three-peat in Hockeytown as the Flyers become the Buffalo Bills of the NHL: they can't win the big one!

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You're likely to unintentionally set off fireworks of some kind before the day is out. Try to maintain a clear perspective.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Do not take action without thinking things through today. Make certain that no inadvertent errors are made.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You are feeling capable and confident at this time, but be aware that some believe you are not "up to task."

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You're likely to come up with some unusual ideas about how the world works, but only a good friend will listen. Be patient.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — A clash of temperament can be expected today. Watch out for a Libra native who claims to know something you don't. Don't lose your cool — it might be a bluff.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You're in no mood for practicality today. You want things to come spontaneously, so be prepared for a path fraught with hazards.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You should be able to promote harmony and peace in a situation riddled with conflict. You may find yourself in the middle.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You can bet that someone will be unusually aggressive with you today. Be the better person and disarm this individual with passive rationality.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — This is a good day to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Someone is watching or listening. Everything "counts!"

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You'll have to rely on your wits today to escape a situation not of your making. A natural talent is likely to emerge during the night.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You can be quite imaginative today, but also perform tasks in their routine matter. Break free of certain molds but don't lose your head!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Take care that you're not confusing fact and fiction, reality and fantasy today. A Cancer native may not buy what you're trying to sell.

Camouflage hats for the Yankees; Atlanta resurges

Aaron Saykin on Major League Baseball

Question: When was the last time you saw the Yankees wearing their camouflage uniforms?

Answer: Well... um... never!

Would the Yankee fans please explain to me why their team has 15 different colored caps, the most recent of which is camouflage? As a matter of fact, I could barely spot it on the shelf because it was camouflaged so well. (Bad joke but I had to use it.)

I can deal with the neon yellow, red, orange, green, and even powder blue caps. Some of them actually don't look all that bad. But who would ever by a camouflage Yankee hat? The only person I could ever think of is Andy Pettite, who may want to stay out of sight after his abysmal game three performance against the Indians.

Bronx Bomber fans owe a debt of gratitude to "El Duque," Orlando Hernandez, who was gold in a must-win game four (that's an idea, gold Yankee hats). The Cuban defector reminded Cleveland that Indian pitching rots when compared to that of New York (and that you can buy the pennant). The only Cleveland starter who could possibly last in the Yanks' rotation is Bartolo Colon, who was near perfect in game three (although it's hard not to look good pitching against Pettite).

As much as I hate New York, I couldn't help but enjoy Paul O'Neill running the bases after his solo home run in game four. You've got to love the guy. He looked upset after sending a pitching deep into the right field stands, and didn't even want to slap hands with the Yankee first base coach. What could he possibly have been upset about? Maybe he wanted to hit the ball farther. Who knows? Just keep Pablo away from the water cooler.

• Just when Sox fans thought that they lost without being haunted by the Curse of the Bambino, the Babe struck again. In order to be associated with the curse, a player/coach who was key to beating Boston must have had a previous connection with the Red Sox. Here's the connection Boston fans: It's the David Justice–Jimy Williams past. Remember game seven of the 1995 World Series, when Atlanta's David Justice homered against the Indians to eventually win the game, he slapped hands with then Braves' third base coach and current Sox skipper Jimy Williams. Justice, who won game two of the divisional series with the home run swing, slapped hands with the Indians third base coach just as Williams did three years earlier.

• Reports of an Atlanta demise have been greatly exaggerated. After falling in a deep hole to the Padres, the suddenly resurgent Braves are now in a position to become the only team to rally from an 0-3 deficit. San Diego manager Bruce Bochy made a bold move when he opted to use starting ace Kevin Brown instead of set-up man Randy Myers in the eighth inning... and boy did Michael Tucker make him pay with a three-run homer to revive his team and place it within two games of the World Series.

Now that all the pressure is on the Padres, the Braves can return to Turner Field knowing that they have retaken the home-field advantage. Tom Glavine will start game six after a brilliant performance in game two, in which Brown edged him in a true pitchers' duel. Sterling Hitchcock will make his second start a day early because original game six starter Brown, who will start game seven if necessary, must be rested after throwing 41 pitches in relief on Monday.

Greg Maddux, on the other hand, proved to be clutch in the relief role. But what else would one expect from the best pitcher of this decade. He is the probable starter for game seven if necessary. With Glavine and Maddux ready for games six and seven, it appears as though baseball fans may be graced with a Braves/Yankees Fall Classic for the second time in three years... unless of course the ghost of Jim Leyritz strikes Atlanta again in game six. After all, he's Hitchcock's private catcher and he's pretty clutch.

• In other news, look for the Colorado Rockies to win the World Series next year. They've got Jim Leyland, now all they need to do is buy a ton of great players and then give them away in the offseason.

• My player of the week is Jim Thome, who hits postseason home-runs like Mickey Mantle (although he hit two off Pettite so I guess they don't really count).

• By the way I was wrong when I said Roger Clemens is among the top five pitchers ever. I think he's seventh. W. Johnson, Feller, Koufax, Gibson, Spahn, Ryan, Clemens, Maddux, Cy Young, and Carlton make my bent 10.

UMass basketball teams hold Media Day press conference

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The microphone echoed with the expectations of Bruiser Flint for the upcoming 1998–99 season yesterday, as the Massachusetts men's basketball coach answered questions from dozens of reporters in the William D. Mullins Center.

Yesterday marked the annual Media Day press conference for the UMass hoopsters, as the squad took one more step towards the season opener at home against Niagara.

"I'm looking forward to another great year," Flint said. "Midnight Madness is on Friday night — we're going to have a pretty good time, and we've got some special things set up. We're ready for a good year. I think we have a pretty good team this year, but we've got to step up and do some of the things we talked about."

"The team has been working hard, and we're getting pretty healthy — Ajmal (Basit) is close to 100 percent," continued Flint. "We're ready to go. I'm really excited."

The daunting challenge facing the two days until.....

Minutemen this year was relayed clearly through the media attendance: Will UMass make it past the first round of the NCAA tournament this year?

In the previous two seasons, Massachusetts' smack into the post-season bracket, but was eliminated in the opening round, most recently by the St. Louis Billikens in 1998.

"[Losing in the NCAA Tournament] is a good motivational point," Flint said. "Do the guys want to go to the tournament and get out in the first round or do we want to take some games? We don't just want to get to the tournament, we want to get back to the Final Four, and we want to win the national championship."

Whether that's a possibility or not depends on who is answering the question.

Athlon published that the Minutemen were a probable Elite Eight contender and ESPN's college basketball guru Dick Vitale placed them between 15th and 20th, while the Sporting News ranked UMass as low as 33rd in the nation, and fourth in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

Nobody disagrees that Massachusetts should be ranked, though.

"You're ranked because you deserve to be ranked," Flint said. "We got everybody back but one player. We have four of our five starters, and our sixth man back, and we added three or four more guys and got some depth."

Only Midnight Madness this Friday stands between the Minutemen and the beginning of the season now. One month of practice will buffer the team as they head into their Nov. 16 clash with Niagara. A pair of exhibition games with the Converse All-Stars and Marathon Oil will also give UMass a pair of tune-ups before the official season opener.

NHL teams have new look for '98 season

James Murphy on NHL

It seems like only yesterday I was losing a bulk of my security deposit putting my foot through two doors in my apartment.

A game-winning goal in overtime by P.J. Axelsson had just been called back by referee Mark Faucette, because Tim Taylor's pinky toe was in the crease. Washington's Joe Juneau then scored the official winner in the second overtime.

Well, if your reading this Mr. Landlord, I promise to be nice to my doors because the National Hockey League's Board of Governors have finally come to their senses and reduced the size of the goal crease.

At the request of most NHL general managers, players, and coaches, the board decided to adopt a series of rule changes over the summer.

In an effort to increase offense and hopfully avoid controversy (and lost security deposits) such as the Tim Taylor incident, the NHL shaved two feet off each side of the goal posts, trimming the goal crease radius down to four feet.

• Well enough of the rule changes, let's look into the crystal ball (i.e. predictions, pre-season picks).

This past off season was probably one of the most active in recent memory. We saw the Golden Brett Hull sign with an already stacked Dallas Stars squad.

The Flyers may have finally solved their puzzle in the net; John Vanbiesbrouck may just be the piece that finally brings them the Cup.

• Detroit, coming off back to back Stanley Cup seasons, filled the void left by Vladimir Konstantinov's tragic departure by wooing away defenseman Uwe Krupp from arch-rival Colorado and signing him to a multi-year contract. As if they could get any better!

• Toronto, who is now in the Eastern Conference (Northeast division) under the new realignment, has a legitimate shot now at making the playoffs as they signed the coveted Curtis Joseph to guard the pipes.

Joseph's signing also means that the Leafs now hold some trade bait in disgruntled goaltender Felix Potvin, who seemingly would be the odd man out since he wants a similar blockbuster deal like "Cujo" signed.

Look for Potvin to be dealt to "Les Habitantes" of Montreal. The Canadiens, after losing one of the greatest, most underrated goalies in our time, Andy Moog, have two young, unproven, netminders in Jocelyn Thibault and Jose Theodore.

Potvin could be the answer, as he has experience from the glory days in Toronto under Pat Burns. Toronto most likely would get the offense they need, as Montreal has publicly let it be known they are willing to deal offensive superstar Mark Recchi. Look for this deal to occur soon.

• Now to the mess in Vancouver and Phoenix. For those of you who don't know, Pavel Bure has sworn he will never play for the Vancouver Canucks again and has kept his word, sitting out training camp, preseason and the first two games.

Bure's main reason for this stand (according to him): "too much media pressure." However, when asked about rumors of him being dealt to such teams as the Rangers or the Islanders, he had no problem with the idea of playing in the media capital of the world, New York. He just won't play under that harsh media scrutiny of the Pacific Northwest.

Come on Pavel, you can do better than "media pressure."

• On the other hand, I am in complete agreement with Keith Tkachuk, the Phoenix forward who also is in a contract holdout and has missed action because of it. Tkachuk is asking for the bucks, $41 million over 5 years, but hey this is a guy who has had multiple 50-goal seasons, has carried the team to the playoffs the last two seasons, and is only getting better.

Along with John Leclair of Philadelphia, he is one of the few true power forwards left in this league. Look for the Coyotes to either ante up, which would be the decent and smart thing to do, or trade him soon. Who knows?

• "Murph's Picks": Here's who will win each division and also who will make some noise this season:

Eastern Conference:

Northeast: Boston — Joe Thornton develops even more scoring '30, along with another stellar year from no. 77. Watch out for Toronto and Montreal.

Atlantic: Philadelphia — Beezer's the difference and the Flyers go back to the finals.

Southeast: Washington — Caps capitalize on easy divisions. Yes, Carolina makes the playoffs.

Minutewomen have high hopes for upcoming season

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team introduced themselves to the media at the Mullins Center to officially kick off the 1998–99 season.

The Minutewomen made their mark last year by finishing 19–11 overall, 11–5 in the A-10, and capped the year off with an NCAA tournament appearance.

There was an air of optimism yesterday as Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien spoke to the press and discussed all of the positives surrounding her squad for the upcoming year.

"We have a tremendous amount of talent on this team," O'Brien said. "Because we tasted success last year, the goals and expectations will be even higher for the team this year."

UMass will return with three of five starters from last year. The Minutewomen will however, need to make up for the departures of star point guard Sabriya Mitchell and forward Kara Tudman.

O'Brien will likely turn to Kathy Coyner and Kara Trent to fill the void left by Mitchell at point guard.

"Sabriya was my mentor and I learned a lot from her," Coyner said. "However, I feel that I am up to the challenge of leading the team at point, and I look forward to helping this team win."

Perhaps the biggest positive for the Minutewomen will be the long awaited return of Kelly Van Huisen to the hardwood.

Van Huisen averaged 15.2 points per game in her first six games to lead UMass before tearing her ACL and sitting out the rest of the season.

"Kelly is one of our most talented players so having her back can only help the team," O'Brien said. "We need to get her ready for competition so that she is at full strength and ready to contribute."

UMass will once again put themselves to the test against high caliber opponents throughout the season.

The Minutewomen will compete in the Aloha Classic in Honolulu, Hawaii, where they will take on Kansas, Hawaii, and Minnesota in late November.

In early December, UMass will head to New York to compete in the Big Apple Classic against the likes of Texas A&M and Colgate.

"The strength of our schedule will require that we stay on top of our game at all times," O'Brien said. "However, we will also have the chance to sneak up on some teams and gain more national attention."

The Minutewomen will open their regular season on Nov. 14, against St. John's at the Mullins Center.

UM field hockey downs Syracuse, 3–0 at home

If fans of the Massachusetts field hockey team had any doubts about Zowie Tucker's ability, they were erased in the Minutewomen's 3–0 win over Syracuse yesterday afternoon at Richard F. Garber Field.

Tucker, UMass' goalie, turned away five Orangewoman shots, including a penalty stroke from Kelly Hambleton 10 minutes into the game. Her teammates translated that defensive confidence into offensive momentum to secure the victory over their regional rival.

"Zowie played a great game," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "It was the most consistent, throughout an entire game, that I've seen Zowie play since she's been here.

"She was mentally into the game the entire time, she was prepared for everything, she was patient," she continued. "And when she stopped that stroke, it set the tone for the rest of the team."

Indeed, UMass (7–5, 2–0 in the Atlantic 10) reaped the offensive benefits of Tucker's glove save on the penalty shot 10 minutes later. Kate Putnam took the ball from a defender close to the right baseline and knocked it toward the net. But the ball bounced off Syracuse goalie Sara Clapp into the cage for the goal.

"Once we get down in that angle we're supposed to shoot for the opposite post to try to set it up for a rebound," Putnam said. "Next thing I knew it went off the goalie and into the goal. When I turned around I didn't really know what had happened but people were cheering."

From there, the Minutewoman defense went back to work, stifling the Orangewomen on three penalty corners in the final six minutes of the first half.

"Our defense is doing a great job," Shea said. "There is one senior and at one point we had three freshmen and two sophomores on defense, so it's been a baptism by fire so to speak. There's nothing like game experience to get them seasoned. They've done a great job, and gotten better every game."

In the second half it was UMass' corner unit that struck paydirt just five minutes into the frame, when freshman Anke Bruemmer connected from the top of the circle with assists from Vicky Browne, who hit out, and Patty Robinson, who stopped the ball.

The goal was the only one generated on any of UMass' six corners.

"We have a very dominant corner, and it's something we can grow on," Shea said. "The main thing on the corner is that you have to get the ball on cage. We wasted our first three corners. That's something we need to adjust, because in some games you may only get that one opportunity."

The Minutewomen took advantage of a scramble in front of Clapp to add an insurance goal with 17:53 remaining in regulation. Nicole Bardell redirected a Lucy Koch feed to the top corner on Clapp's right side to push the UMass advantage to 3–0.

UMass had another chance to score with just under 10 minutes left in the game, but Erica Johnston sent a penalty stroke wide of the cage.

The Minutewomen will not get to rest on their laurels for long, as they travel to Providence College today for a 3:30 p.m. contest on the grass surface of Hendrickson Field. But the change in surface does not concern Shea.

"Good teams have to be able to play on any surface and deal with any kind of adversity," Shea said.

Death toll still unclear in Dominican

SAN JUAN DE LA MAGUANA, Dominican Republic (AP) — Weeks after Hurricane Georges entombed entire shantytowns in several feet of mud and rock, residents are clamoring for an answer to one question: How many really died?

Opposition politicians say more than 1,000 were killed and have accused the government of a cover-up. Authorities said fewer than 300 died and complain that critics are complicating relief efforts. The debate over numbers has consumed this impoverished, shellshocked Caribbean nation of 8 million residents — especially in San Juan de la Maguana, a banana-producing region of 20,000 people devastated by hurricane flooding.

It took rescuers six days to reach the area by land after Georges struck Sept. 22. Getting water and food to desperate survivors was paramount. Five shantytowns, including a basin area called Mesopotamia, were destroyed.

NATION

Violent crimes down in nation's schools

WASHINGTON (AP) — Ninety percent of schools report no serious violent crimes such as robbery and weapon attacks, despite the deadly string of shootings that led many to tighten security, the government said yesterday in advance of a White House conference on school safety.

Still, "even one incident of crime in school is too many," Education Secretary Richard Riley said in releasing a report on school safety.

The definition of serious violent crimes includes attacks with a weapon, rapes, robbery, murder and suicide. School crime is down overall.

The report and today's conference are in response to the six multiple homicides at public schools last year that left 16 people dead. But at the same time the Clinton administration must show it is doing something about the violence, it is being careful not to rattle confidence in public schools.

The administration is portraying itself as champion of public schools against Republican efforts to make it easier for parents to send children to private and parochial schools.

Gubernatorial candidates face off

Harshbarger, Cellucci engage in heated debate, try to gain upper hand

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Last night the two candidates for governor of Massachusetts, Attorney General Scott Harshbarger and Acting Governor Paul Cellucci, met in the VIP Room of the William D. Mullins Center to debate the issues of higher education reform and health care, among others.

BRIAN McDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Republican candidate Paul Cellucci speaks at the Massachusetts gubernatorial debate yesterday evening at the William D. Mullins Center.

The debate included four parts: panel questions; audience questions; candidate questions to one another; and closing statements.

The evening began on the question of the "no new taxes pledge," which Cellucci has repeatedly asked Harshbarger to sign.

"I pledge that I will not spend one penny more than we can afford. Paul Cellucci has broken his pledge, and I would raise the tobacco tax to pay for health care for kids," Harshbarger said.

Cellucci argued that raising taxes was Harshbarger's No. 1 priority.

"Every time we have a new program you want to raise taxes. Raising taxes is in your blood," said Cellucci. "We have restored the health of the Commonwealth. We have cut taxes 28 times and have spent eight years repairing this economy. Harshbarger would out-spend the legislature, he is a risk," Cellucci said.

Harshbarger responded by claiming that another four years of the Cellucci administration would be the real risk.

"We can't afford four more years of failure on education. When Cellucci had the chance to boost the economy he vetoed worker re-training and vetoed library renovations and he is just coasting on an economic boom," Harshbarger said.

Cellucci responded by verifying that the jobs created were high tech jobs, and that Massachusetts was leading the national economic recovery instead of just coasting.

The candidates were also asked to respond to the issue of helping western Massachusetts.

"We want to make education job No. 1, and boost regional economic development in western Massachusetts. When Paul had a chance to help western Massachusetts he vetoed worker re-training," Harshbarger said.

Cellucci rebuked by pointing out that his running mate, Jane Swift, is from western Massachusetts, and she would be there everyday helping him improve the western Massachusetts economy.

On issues of education the two candidates argued extensively. Panelist Dan Elias, from Channel 22 News, asked how Cellucci's teacher testing standards would work without getting rid of all teachers by the year 2001, the date Cellucci had set for decredited schools with low test scores.

"The vast majority of teachers will be able to pass this test. I'm worried about the few teachers who can't pass this basic test. I'll insist that our universities of higher education have higher standards for admissions," Cellucci said.

Harshbarger retorted by explaining he never new which Paul Cellucci would show up for these debates.

"For seven years you did no testing, all of the sudden in an election year, you test," Harshbarger said.

Mudslinging overshadows 2nd debate

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Last night at the William D. Mullins Center, the Massachusetts gubernatorial candidates put mudslinging, rather than the issues, at the forefront of the debates.

Throughout the evening the candidates pointed fingers at each other and exchanged insults, over issues such as education, taxes, health care, crime and welfare.

Acting Governor Paul Cellucci pointed the finger at state Attorney General Scott Harshbarger, who supports an increased tax on cigarettes. This tax, he contests, would aid children without health insurance.

News

"Scott Harshbarger thinks every time you have a new program, you have to raise taxes. Raising taxes is in his blood," Cellucci repeatedly said.

In response to Cellucci's accusation, Harshbarger said the acting governor had already gone back on his word of no new taxes, when he increased tolls on the Massachusetts turnpike.

"If Paul Cellucci had his way, sick kids in this state would not have health care," Harshbarger said.

The candidates spoke briefly and broadly about the topic of higher education.

Harshbarger said, under Cellucci's governorship, "Public education is near the bottom. I'll make education job No. 1."

Cellucci dismissed Harshbarger's claim.

"Look at the budget I've proposed every single year, reduced class size every year, cut tuition four years in a row," he said.

The candidates failed to speak on the lack of formal student representation at the debate, and made no reference to this campus's role as the flagship public university in the state of Massachusetts.

The candidates throughout the debate called each other liars, as they talked over each other and matched each other's competing intensities.

Cellucci continually blamed Harshbarger for his lack of "financial responsibility," while Harshbarger took the acting governor to task for his "gimmicks."

Harshbarger also criticized Cellucci for his actions in health care and education reform, and in return, Cellucci accused Harshbarger of supporting welfare and tax increases. The candidates' comments continually incited the audience, who actively cheered and booed, despite the requests of the debate's moderator to maintain silence.

While candidates debate, protestors voice concerns

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The contention over who is the best candidate for governor started an hour before the gubernatorial debate began at the William D. Mullins Center last night.

Crowds of the two candidate's supporters chanted slogans back and forth and students carrying signs yelled protests over the din of the West Springfield High School marching band that played through it all.

Of the hundreds of people standing along barricades that lined the entrance way to the Mullins Center, the vast majority were supporters of the two candidates. However, there was a smaller contingency of student groups voicing opposition to the candidates and the debate.

Supporters of state Attorney General Scott Harshbarger chanted "Send Paul home;" while supporters for acting Governor Paul Cellucci shouted "Four more years." Both groups waved posters and signs in support of their candidate.

Some of the members of opposition groups used megaphones to get their message through the cheering and the West Springfield marching band that played.

"I feel they are sheep. They are following political ideologies with out thinking," said Bron Tamulis, a protester and member of the Radical Student Union (RSU), about the candidate's chanting supporters.

In addition to the members of the RSU, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, the Student Government Association, the Cannabis Reform Coalition and others protested the debate for various reasons.

"We're here to protest both the students not being allowed in [to watch] the debate and the two party system. They wouldn't let Dean Cook in because he was not a Democrat or Republican. He's libertarian," Tamulis said as he stood holding a sign reading "Where is Dean Cook?" "If anything [he came] just to bring attention to the fact there are other candidates running."

Members of some groups said they came to protest the limited number of students allowed to see the debate in person.

"I definitely support the students that are protesting that we're not let in," said Student Trustee Eleanor Court, who was among those not permitted to see the debate in person.

Trustees were given a limited number of tickets but Court said she did not receive her's.

"I got a voice mail [yesterday] saying they were sorry, it was an oversight [and a ticket would be ready at the door] and I went to the door and they said they didn't know anything about it."

"It was just such a big opportunity for students as a learning experience and yet students were not allowed. Students vote too and I think they forget that," said Lisa Cook, speaker of the SGA.

"That's a big reason why students don't vote, because they get ignored," said Saliwa Shamapande, president of the SGA.

However, others used the chance to send the candidates a message about other issues.

"We want the candidates to be aware of what we're promoting... water watch, preserving the arctic wilderness," said Hilary Milens, a chapter organizer for the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG).

"I'm not partisan. My affiliation is with MASSPIRG," said Jacqueline Wiley, a volunteer with MASSPIRG.

"I'm here to expose the reality that both candidates have overseen a huge increase in prison building. Locking people up doesn't stop crime because they keep doing it," said Chris Johnson, a member of the Friends of the Radical Anti- Imperialist League.

Learning Support offers students extra help

By Anira Dahlstroin
Collegian Correspondant

The night before a test can be stressful, but for those needing extra help in their studies there is an alternative to drinking coffee and cramming all night long.

Learning Support Services (LSS) has begun its fifth year as a free resource for students seeking extra help in various subjects.

Students can receive one-on-one or small group tutorials in anything from Accounting to Portuguese from an LSS peer leader trained and proficient in the subject.

Supplemental Instruction seminars are available for larger groups in which students can compare notes, discuss readings and prepare for exams.

Study skills workshops are also offered throughout the semester.

LSS has recently installed a computer system complete with interactive software programs and also has a collection of videotapes on hand covering various subjects.

LSS is eager to get students involved although many students already take advantage of these services, especially shortly before an exam.

Matt Dalbeck, a junior civil engineering major, said getting together with classmates and an LSS tutor for a study session before an exam is helpful.

Airiel Davis, a junior biochemistry major, has worked with students at LSS for the past three years and tutors biology, chemistry and math. On an evening before tests she keeps busy, sometimes attempting to cram a whole section of course work into the head of a student that has barely cracked a book.

But she said enjoys the work and finds that helping students refreshes the subject matter for her and thus helps with her own studies. And to all those who wait until the last minute to get help for a test, she said with a smile, "I'll do my best."

Students are encouraged to stop by LSS and check out the schedule of available tutorials and other information helpful to improving one's academics.

LSS is also always looking for students interested in becoming peer leaders.

LSS is located on the 10th floor of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library and is open for students to use computers from 11 am–8 p.m. Monday through Thursday, and from 11 a.m.–4 p.m. Friday. It is open for tutoring from 12–8 p.m. Monday– Thursday and 1–4 p.m. Friday.

Food services consider privatization

Auxiliary Services weighes potential options for students

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

As a part of the University Center 2000(UC2000) plan at the University of Massachusetts designed to meet students preferences, privatization is being implemented in the Campus Center and may be considered in the Dining Halls.

Auxiliary Services and the American Federation for State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) has been meeting to discuss the issue of bringing private catering businesses to the Campus Center to better provide the food variety that students want.

Ashoke Ganguli, director of Auxiliary Services, feels that his job as the director is to provide a variety of food choices while keeping with one of the lowest board prices in the nation.

"We are here to serve the students and privatization in the dining halls would not be in their best interest," Ganguli said. "We have one of the lowest board prices in the nation, and I'd like to challenge any Ivy League school to meet the quality at that price."

In meeting with the UC2000 plan, Ganguli placed DelGreco Pizza in Southwest after Antonio's Pizza decided to leave the University. He allowed the private business in an effort to give students what they want without interfering with the dining halls. The contracts with other private corporations are currently being arranged. It has not been decided which businesses will move into the Campus Center by the year 2000.

The funds allocated towards providing the plans for UC2000 were handled in part by Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page. According to Page, his actions concerning financing privatization were in the best interests of the students.

"I don't believe we're meeting our customer's expectations," Page said. "We need to satisfy them in the best way possible and in their best interest."

Meeting with the University and showing concern over the consequences of privatization is AFSCME, an organization that is in charge of labor relations.

Francis Martin, the Vice-President of AFSCME and a supervisor of the Bluewall, Hatch and Coffee Shop, feels that privatization will greatly affect his businesses as well as student jobs.

"These private corporations will move in, replacing already existing businesses. They will set their own prices, and when a student job position becomes available, they will not bother to replace it," Martin said. "We're talking about a monopolized business until the end of their contract and even then, you wouldn't be able to get them out."

Small businesses like Earthfoods feel that a private business would affect their customer and worker affiliation.

"By having something like a Burger King in the food court would draw away our customers because the smell of fast–food would be less appealing to the eating habits of our customers," Earthfood's co–manager Chris Dooley said. "People come here expecting cheap, healthy food, and a student run business like us wouldn't be able to compete with a corporations higher paying wages."

The original UC2000 construction plan was set up so Earthfoods would actually be placed directly across from McDonald's in the food court, but the plan was changed when it was considered to be in conflict with what Earthfoods offers.

While UC2000 is under planning, Page feels that the progress of privatization provides for everyone's best interest.

"We will focus on doing what it takes to improve our service, whether it's in presenting or preparing the food, our goal is to be responsive to what the students want."

Another source of student job opportunities is the dining halls, which employ student help for management and food preparation.

AFSCME President Charlotte Coates feels that this student job source would be affected by privatization.

"This campus was built on taxpayer's dollars for the sole purpose of keeping the cost of higher education affordable for all," Coates said. "It was never intended for corporations to come in, to capitalize and make profits."

Ken Toong, Director of Dining Services, said that even though there has never been discussion of privatization in the dining halls, the process needs to be put in perspective.

"The thing we need to look at is what the students want, and they want a variety of food with the quality of freshness and at the lowest cost available to them," Toong said. "We need to look at how we can improve the quality of food and at the same time make it more appealing to the student."

For senior Matthew DeRemer, privatization would be the best way to go.

"It's about time that we finally have competition for food services," DeRemer said. "Hopefully it would result in better food for everyone."

Instead of the all–you–can–eat for the swipe of a card, according to AFSCME, the Auxiliary Service Board of Trustees are currently reviewing what may someday become a privatized catering business in the Dining Halls.

Coates feels that a more immediate cause of concern to students is the privatization that is scheduled to occur in the Campus Center as a part of the UC2000 project.

Coates, who does not want to see privatization involved with higher education, feels that such a process would not only hurt the present businesses, but in the long–run it would also be costly to the student economy and may result in the loss of student jobs.

"Many of these big privatized companies will move in and when a student employment position becomes available, the private company will not bother to replace it," Coates said. "The outcome would be a private business with no student opportunities."

Martin agrees with Coates, and adds that in addition to student job losses, these private organizations would be able to set their own prices, charge the students at their own expense, and at the same time, pay the University nothing.

Toong, whose previous experience is with Mariott, feels that privatization in the dining halls would not work to the student's best interest, and he would rather focus on preparing the food to provide a better quality of service.

Martin expressed his annoyance with Auxiliary Services' lack of communication with AFSCME, and he feels that privatization will occur if he doesn't fight back.

"The University thinks that the students want a fast food chain in the Campus Center," Martin said. "You a have such a good facility here, so why would you want a McDonald's when you can get it in nearby towns."

Coates pointed out that she could easily see a private fast food restaurant taking over the Hatch or Coffee Shop.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Supporters of Democrat Scott Harshbarger and Republican Paul Cellucci show their support in front of the William D. Mullins Center before the debate yesterday evening.

But some groups came to support other groups' causes, and called for a diverse agenda of issues be addressed by the candidates.

"The main focus is to just bring attention to other issues. The fact that it's not just a two–party system," said Liz Rising, a member of the Cannabis Reform Coalition.

Chancellor David K. Scott addressed the protesting in his welcoming speech before the debate.

"[This is a] very lively, very active campus but good intentioned, we hope," Scott said.

University, and advisor to Cellucci, said that universities had failed to meet standards and they should be discredited.

"It wasn't till we appointed John Silber that we found our teaching colleges aren't doing the jobs they're supposed to be doing," Cellucci said.

Harshbarger responded to the statement Silber's statement by saying that he would get rid of Silber, Whose own university, BU, failed the teacher tests.

Cellucci retorted by saying that there is no doubt Harshbarger would get rid of Silber because he's for teacher testing and high standards.

Both candidates were asked about higher education here in western Massachusetts by Mary Carey, a reporter for the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

"The state of affairs here in western Massachusetts is a direct indictment of Paul Cellucci's failure to make higher education job one. Our public higher education is near the bottom across the country. We're going to make UMass and higher education job one," Harshbarger said.

Cellucci fired back by bringing his record to the forefront.

"We have reduced class size every year and cut tuition four years in a row," Cellucci said.

Harshbarger asked a direct higher education question of Cellucci during the Lincoln/Douglas portion of the debate. He questioned why, if education is job one, did Cellucci's own education committee call his administration a failure.

"The money we have put into schools has bought books, computers, hired teachers and reduced class size," Cellucci said of his record.

Harshbarger argued extensively that the legislature was responsible for this and that Cellucci loved to take credit.

Harshbarger used his closing arguments to promote his case for the corner office.

"You have a choice on Nov. 3 to choose someone for governor who is a leader or for someone who stands still. You deserve a governor who will stand up for you, and I'll be that governor," Harshbarger said.

Cellucci closed by stating his record and qualifications.

"I believe that my record on creating jobs and taking care of our students stands alone. I believe that Jane Swift and I are best qualified to lead this state," Cellucci said.

■ mudslinging

Education reform, a hot–topic of the election, received attention from both candidates.

Harshbarger likened Cellucci's use of the new teacher certification test to a "pop–quiz" and accused him of unfairly, bashing teachers.

"Now you want to test veteran teachers when there is heavy retirement going on. There'll be a shortage of teachers," he said.

"Eighty percent failed. The test was a wake up call for schools of education," responded Cellucci.

The controversial test is a central focus of both campaigns.

Harshbarger claimed that it was used by Cellucci as a "gimmick," while Cellucci interjected that his plan is an appropriate tool for educational reform.

Both candidates touched on welfare concerns in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Harshbarger said he believed in welfare reform and that "people who want to be helped, should be helped."

Cellucci was accused by Harshbarger of "demoralizing welfare recipients."

"I care about millions of people who go to work and single mothers who go to community college at night," Cellucci said.

Both accused the other, again, of ardently lying.

The debate continued with the focus of the candidates turning to treatment of criminals in the Commonwealth.

"I say let's build more prisons and keep violent offenders off the street," said Cellucci, who just oversaw construction of the first maximum security prison in Massachusetts in 45 years.

Harshbarger contends that education is the best and cheapest form of crime prevention.

"We should build prisons, and have crumbling schools?" Harshbarger rhetorically asked his opponent.

After the debate, Cellucci said he was not surprised by his opponents brash style, compared to prior debates. He said someone had probably told the attorney general he needed to change his presentational skills.

Harshbarger was pleased with his performance and said he wanted to spend his time talking about the issues, and not to deflect them by dispensing one–liners.

One–liners, however, were used by the both candidates to draw attention to their opponent's flaws, and away from the issues they intend to tackle if they win the gubernatorial election.

UMass secures funds for undergrad awards

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Correspondent

A new scholarship will offer as much as $500,000 in grants over the next few years to University of Massachusetts undergraduate students.

At an informational meeting held yesterday, students were informed that as much as $100,000 of the grants will be available as soon as next semester to help students who wish to teach math and sciences.

"We just got the money, so we're giving it in the middle of the year. Since this is so new, we don't really know what response we are going to get from students," said Erica Wilson, a graduate student who works on the project.

The program, known as Science Technology Engineering Mathematics Teacher Education Collaborative (STEMTEC) is funded by the National Science Foundation, which granted $5 million to initiate the five–year plan.

It is one of only three grants that are awarded per year by the foundation, from a pool of about 50 applicant universities.

Its aim is to improve the preparation of elementary and high school science and math teachers, as well as to increase their numbers and diversity.

"It is important and exciting to have this opportunity. The elementary and high school teaching period is critical. We always remember the teachers that got us to where we are," said Wilson.

The grant for the program was awarded two years ago jointly to eight colleges in Western Massachusetts, one of which is UMass.

"The invitation from the National Science Foundation gave us an opportunity to improve science and teaching. Subsequently, we were given an additional $100,000 a year for scholarships," said Morton Sternheim, a UMass professor who participated in writing the proposal.

Last year, the program focused on college professors and improving college courses and emphasized the importance of active student learning. Forty college professors and 15 high school teachers from the Amherst area attended teaching workshops in the past summer, and as a result, revised many of their classes, including some here at UMass.

This year, the focus is the student program and the scholarships. There are about 40–50 grants, ranging from $1,000 to $5,000 available to students who have interest in math and science, and who are also interested in elementary or high school education.

"The student program is aimed at using college resources to improve education at K–12 schools," said Sharon Palmer, director of student services for STEMTEC.

Students are expected to participate in a teaching activity, and have a wide variety of support services available to them through STEMTEC, such as workshops and courses.

"There is a teaching component, either on or off campus. The experience is not meant to be burdensome, but rather to expose students to teaching," Palmer said.

The program also offers a website, searchable through the general UMass site, which includes scholarship information, deadlines and a classifieds board featuring teachers looking for volunteer student tutors.

Child killer sentenced to life

LAS VEGAS (AP) — A young man who molested and strangled a 7–year–old girl in a casino toilet stall claimed he was in a "drunken and drugged haze" at the time and begged for forgiveness yesterday before being sentenced to life in prison with no hope of parole.

"I am truly sorry. If I were given the opportunity to exchange my life for Sherrice's and bring her back, I would not hesitate, not even for a second," said Jeremy Strohmeyer, 20.

The former high school honor student from Long Beach, Calif., pleaded guilty to murder in the 1997 slaying of Sherrice Iverson, who had been left in a casino arcade with her older brother while their father gambled at what was then the Primadonna Casino. As part of a plea bargain, Strohmeyer was sentenced to four life terms with no parole.

Strohmeyer read a statement in court in which he said he killed the girl after the sexual assault to "stop her pain." He apologized to her parents and said he didn't remember the attack.

"Can you imagine the fear, the panic, the sickness that rushes over you as you realize that somehow, you have done something to this little girl to cause her to be dying, yet you don't remember anything?" he said.

U.S. of hate

I am absolutely ashamed to be an American. The harsh truth of this deeply rooted feeling came Monday night when I heard about the murder of a college student at the University of Wyoming. homophobia being the motive behind the slaying.

For those of you who have not heard, Matthew Shepard was found in a coma last Wednesday. The people who discovered his body in the snow, at first mistook him for a scarecrow. The news served as a loud and clear message that hate is definitely alive and well in the United States. As I listened to the grisly details of the attack ("lashed to a split- rail fence... his skull was so badly smashed that surgery could not be performed,") my stomach churned. What further nauseated me was the almost certain fact that a few people in this country remain unaffected and some actually applaud such an act.

> "If we can get Congress to take a break from dissecting Clinton's over–publicized sex life, maybe it will expand the Hate Crimes Protection Act to include sexual orientation."
> Kevin Monahan

Lack of tolerance is a virus that will kill us all if we do not vaccinate ourselves quickly. So, Matthew Shepard was gay. Does that make him less of a person? Does that give his attackers the right to kill him? The idea that there is just one person who would answer "yes" to these questions sickens and appalls me.

Did they ever think that he had a family before they killed him? Did they think that no one would care if they killed a "fag"? Did they take pleasure in the knowledge that Matthew would die a slow, painful death? Did they actually think that they were doing the right thing? Well, they obviously were doing the "right" thing. I've never been in favor of the death penalty, but I'm not going lose any sleep over the fate of the two attackers. Suffice to say that we are dealing with some very insecure (according to Freudian terms) people here.

After the dragging death of a black man earlier this year, you would think that more people would take action against hate crimes. Our responsibility as human beings is to not forget these incidents; to not let intolerance turn into irrational violence against oppressed people.

Yet I read article after article advocating limiting the rights of homosexuals. I see the Christian Coalition all over my television, swaying the easily led sheep of this country to elect a "moral leader," one that will take to the streets to eliminate homosexuality. What can we do about it but change the channel or put down the paper? What are we going to do when the Boston Herald's gay–basher in residence, Don Feder, comes to campus later this month to spout his propaganda? Are we actually to nod our heads in acquiescence while theories of exclusion are preached? And as if things are not sorrowful enough for Matthew's loved ones, Rev. Fred Phelps of Topeka, Kansas is planning to lead his followers in a picket demonstration at Matthew's funeral. The Christian crusade against gays does not stop even at harassing the bereaved.

Is it even possible to extinguish the hate that is burning a hole through our nation? Parents teach it to their children, children teach it to other children, and the "religious" right teaches it to the masses. When this information is taken into consideration, is it any surprise that Matthew Shepard was killed? It amazes me that more gay people aren't brutally murdered. How else are right–wing automatons to rid the world of homosexuality?

If we can get Congress to take a break from dissecting Clinton's over–publicized sex life, maybe it will expand the Hate Crimes Protection Act to include sexual orientation. Maybe we can actually make it illegal to assault, abuse or discriminate against someone because he or she is homosexual. Maybe we can make every state recognize the radical notion that gays and lesbians are actually human beings. Maybe we can challenge hatred in our own lives, as we encounter it, if not for our sake, for Matthew's and his family's.

There will be a candlelight vigil for Matthew at the Amherst Common tonight from 5:30 to 7 pm. I've never met Matthew Shepard, but I'm sure he'll be missed.

Word is Bond

I found myself wondering the other day, "Why is everyone stressing out over all this work?" The best–case–scenario for most of us is that we come out of here with a good GPA and down the road end up getting a good job that hopefully has some thing remotely to do with our major.

Of course when I say "good job" I mean a well–paying job. If by saying good job I meant 'fun job' then hardly anyone would have one. What I was really wondering though is does anyone go to school to become what they really want to be.

Take my girlfriend for example. She is going to school to become a pharmacist. I don't think that you can really say that she wants to be a pharmacist. Being a pharmacist is simply the best job that she can think of. I'm sure that if she had her choice of being anything or anyone she would choose something besides a pharmacist. I think that I might want to be an actor, my friend Jimmy would want to be a baseball player, and my roommate would probably want to be a porn star.

All of this thought brought me to the age old question, "If you could be anyone, who would you be?" I know that this is a very difficult question. After all everyone is going to look at it from a different point of view. Some people are going to see it in terms of wealth or property. And who can blame those people? It would be nice to have money to burn or to live in a giant mansion. Other people will shape their answer in terms of beauty or fame. Once again I can understand wanting to be gawked at. Still other people may shape their answers in terms of how they can help and affect the world around them. I tip my hat to these noble souls.

No matter what though, given enough time, almost everyone will come up with someone or some thing they would like to be rather than themselves for at least a little while.

When I asked some of my friends they said things like Austin Powers, Jesus Christ and Bob Marley. None of these are bad answers, but I don't think that any of them are correct.

With this question, which everyone is asked at least once in their life in mind, I set out to find what I believed was the correct answer. Now when I say the "correct answer" I don't mean for myself, I mean for everyone. I believe that there must be some universal correct answer to the question, "If you could be anyone who would you be?"

Dan Viens

I knew that if I could clear my mind entirely the answer would surely come to me like some sort of vision. I only hoped that the heavens would open up to me and my own holy grail would appear in front of me. With a completely optimistic state of mind I set out into the wilderness with nothing but myself, my chapstick, a sleeping bag, a toaster, a portable TV and VCR, an air mattress, a Discman, a cell phone, my laptop, a pistol and a battery–powered alarm clock. I was ready to clear my mind and get back to nature. To my dismay, although I was also overjoyed, the answer hit me before I had even packed my rented RV half way.

The answer that I had been searching for, the very answer that had been eluding me for these 20 years, had hit me. I had found the correct answer for all men as to who we should be instead of ourselves if we had the choice. The answer for the women still escapes me — it's somewhere between Joan of Arc and Pamela Anderson. Now, back to business.

The only acceptable answer for all men is and will always be none other than James Bond. If you disagree with me please give this column a chance, and after you read it if you still don't agree then, your opinion is dead wrong.

James Bond. Of course. Now that I have thought of it, it seems so obvious. It's like one of those magic eye things, as soon as you see it once you see it every time.

Let me explain myself and I'm sure that before you know it every guy you know will want to be James Bond. I will start with his financial status. He always has enough money to do whatever he wants to do. Really, when do you ever see him spend any money. All of the unbelievable cars he drives and all of the cool gadgets he has are given to him by the British government. All he ever has to pay for are his clothes, housing, food and any cosmetics he might use. I'm sure that these expenses are no problem considering that he must get paid quite well, not to mention that his job probably has full benefits.

Next we will move on to appearance and fame. Every time we see James Bond he is always looking quite handsome and youthful. Plus he always has a new drop–dead gorgeous girl by his side. Maybe there are some guys around who would only want to be with one woman for the rest of their lives. Well to appease you I'm sure that if James wanted to settle down, one of those ladies would be happy to marry him. As far as fame goes Bond is such a great secret agent that everyone knows who he is, but can't stop him.

Now for those bleeding hearts and philanthropists out there who want to help others- they need look no further than good ole' James Bond. His job is to oppose and fight evil. He has literally saved the world on many occasions.

Now maybe there are a few things that you are looking for that I have yet to mention. For instance, he can hold his liquor, he is a great skier and driver and he fears nothing. The only possible fault that I can think of is that maybe he is sterile. After all, he has been with an awful lot of women to not sire any children. This is however only speculation.

All of these things — plus the fact that you would be able to say,"Bond, James Bond" and mean it — make it clear that the absolute best choice for men to be besides themselves is James Bond.

Read the signs

Everybody wants to know their futures, and why not? You could make much better decisions if you knew exactly what was on the horizon, and the daily horoscopes are as good a bet as any to tell you what is coming up for you.

Here at the Collegian, we offer a horoscope section, but, like most horoscope sections, the predictions given are mostly vague descriptions of one's social life or financial fate.

I don't know about you, but I've gotten very tired of these, and those who write the daily zodiacs can kiss my astrology. I'm going to go out on a limb and, using my magical powers of the constellations, write horoscopes for you that are exact. No more beating around the bush — these will tell you precisely what lies ahead for you in these trying times.

Seth Koenig

Libra (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You will eat something today, but not just anything: you will eat food. After eating this food, you will notice that the feeling of hunger that you previously had will no longer be plaguing you, and this will leave you more capable of concentrating on other tasks.

Scorpio (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — The moon says that if you stick your hand in a fire today, you will suffer painful burns and probably swear. Avoid this occurrence by simply keeping all of your limbs out of any flickering flames, although there's still a good chance you'll swear before nightfall. And yes, nightfall will come today, so don't be alarmed when it does.

> "The moon says that if you stick your hand in a fire today, you will suffer painful burns and probably swear."

Sagittarius (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Chances are, you will go to the bathroom today and excrete waste from your over–loaded digestive system. The toilet you will use will be white, and there will be water somewhere in your surroundings. Good luck, and hope that the excrement comes out the right end.

Capricorn (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You will see a television somewhere in the course of your travels today, and it will probably be on, though not necessarily. If it is on, know that there will be a commercial on soon, as advertising is unavoidable for you today. What is being advertised is definitely worth buying for somebody living in this area code, but the item will surely cost money.

Aquarius (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — No matter what you do, some information, though perhaps an insignificantly small amount, about Bill Clinton getting it on with Monica Lewinsky and what might happen to him because of it will infiltrate your senses. You will hear a joke that goes like this, "Why does Monica Lewinsky have puffy cheeks? Because she's withholding evidence!" You will laugh, but only if you like it.

Pisces (Feb. 18–Mar. 20) — There will be a point in time over the next 24 hours that you will get into bed. Once there, you will do one of two things; sleep or have sex and then sleep. Either way, you will feel better than you did while you weren't in bed. Be prepared for this moment, and be sure to take your footwear off before either endeavor.

Aries (Mar. 21–Apr. 19) — According to the alignment of the stars, your birthday will come between March 21st and April 19th this year. When the special date rolls around, people will give you presents, and you are guaranteed to appreciate at least one of them. Also, realize that no matter how hard you try to, you can't keep yourself from blinking, so don't waste your energy fighting it.

Taurus (Apr. 20–May 20) — Air will fill your lungs today, as you inhale. Strangely, your rib cage will expand ever so slightly to compensate for the influx of space– consuming oxygen atoms, as this peculiar process keeps your heart beating with blood in an indirect way.

Gemini (May 21–June 20) — Unless you're a slob, you'll not only take a shower today, but brush your teeth as well, as you'd rather not smell like rotting fish to all of your acquaintances. If you are a slob, you will have a hard time getting close to that special someone, as their tendency to get nauseous as they get within 12 feet of you will prevent that.

Cancer (June 21–July 22) — You'd rather not be attacked by a raving maniac today, but if you run through the psychiatric ward of a hospital screaming "kill me!" over and over again while handing out ginsu knives to anyone with a twitch in their eye, you might have to deal with that possibility.

Leo (July 23–Aug. 22) — Consider yourself extremely cool today as you share horoscope signs with Seth Koenig, the famous columnist. Don't get too cocky, though, as Evander Holyfield could still beat the stuffing out of you if you happen to aggravate him enough.

Virgo (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You will read Seth Koenig's column in the Daily Collegian today, and you will realize just how exact he can be in his horoscope spoof. Everything he said was true!

Bryan McAllister

In the movie Swingers, Mike calls a girl he just met at a bar over and over again at 2:30 in the morning. He keeps getting her answering machine, and keeps leaving messages, explaining the previous one, then trying to get something out before it cuts him off again. It's painful and funny at the same time, as Mike keeps digging himself deeper. He finally calls and "breaks up" with her, without ever going out with her.

> Swingers: Show me the "Money"
> Mike Messaros

"It's just not working," he says. Finally Nicki picks up: "Mike, don't ever call me again."

Swingers doesn't so much have a plot, as it follows the romantic life of "nice guy" Mike, palling around with his friends in LA, trying to meet "babies." Scripted by Jon Favreau (who also stars), the movie just unwinds lazily towards a conclusion. The painfully truthful Mike gets himself in trouble by talking too much about his ex– girlfriend. He is constantly at odds between his nice guy demeanor and the alpha male role his friends are saying will get him laid. What he wants and the means to get it seem oceans apart based on what his friends tell him.

And there encapsulates the modern male dilemma: is it the niceness that wins the girl, or is it the aggression? Is it for one night or forever? Does the one night lead to forever, thereby making "by any means necessary" the slogan of modern dating, hoping that this will lead to something deeper, moving off of the superficial plane? As his friends tell him: "Mike, you've... you've got these claws... and she's this little bunny and you're just... you're just batting her around!" And when Mike does glance across the bar and catch the eye of a "baby," he blinks and sees her as a little bunny.

But the argument can be made that his aggression is cooled

It all started with that breezy Gap commercial. Advertising majors, I'm sure, will tell you that all you need is some young, fresh–faced Calvin Klein models, a catchy theme song, and dance moves you could only do with years of practice, and you have the attention of America's youth. Not that there's anything wrong with that.

It was only matter of time, after all. Courtesy of Grease and American Graffiti, 50's rock 'n' roll was the first to be resurrected. Then disco. Inevitably, the fanciest and most retro of leisure trends — swing dancing — was bound to make it's way back into American pop–culture.

And now, swing is omnipresent, with appearances by the big bands on Leno and Letterman and movies featuring terms and music. The popular WB show "Dawson's Creek" will feature a late–season swing dance at the kids' high school. One of those big bands, the Brian Setzer Orchestra, stakes its claim at Bud Bowl 98. You know you're not when even the "beer–drinking" cynical–of–anything slightly–feminine guys" accept you.

That, I think, is the real secret to swing's comeback. Everyone enjoys it — girls, guys, college kids, old people. It's the kind of dance that you actually wouldn't mind seeing your parents at.

Of course, like all fads, swing dancing never really went away. Since it's genesis in the 30s, it's been evolving and changing over generations. But now it's "back," because American kids say it and when American kids speak, people tend to listen. In this case, for those of you scoring at home, speaking = money.

The difference between swing and

Love and Rockets *Lift*ing expectations once again

LIFT
Love and Rockets
Red Ant

Daniel Ash has a very eclectic resume. Aside from being one of the godfathers of goth-rock, he fronted the 80's synth-pop outfit Tones on Tail and acts as the vocalist/guitarist for Love and Rockets.

Lift, Love and Rockets' latest effort is more on the electronic side than any of their previous releases.

Lift is a far cry from Express and Seventh Dream of Teenage Heaven, but then again, each Love and Rockets album bears little similarity to its predecessor. Their constant reinventing and refusal to rehash themselves has helped make them one of the most interesting contemporary rock bands.

Lift is by far superior to the band's last release, Sweet F.A., which, among their best works, along with Hot Trip to Heaven and Earth Sun and Moon. Love and Rockets, consisting of Ash and fellow Bauhaus bandmates David J. (bass/cello/co-lyricist) and drummer Kevin Haskins (also of Tones on Tail), have their direction set for them with the first track "Lift (Malibu Mix)."

Opening and closing the album with remixes of the same song smoothly sets the tone of the disc and concludes the album on a familiar note. "RIP20 C" is a great track with a menacing pace. Familiar three letter acronyms fly at a dizzying speed until we finally get to "USA/RIP."

"Resurrection Hex," the first single off Lift, with its dance-house ambiance, is one of the album's gems. Featuring samples of Adam Ant's "Kings of the Wild Frontier" and Bauhaus' own "Stigmata Martyr" and "In the Night," Ash, J., and Haskins share writing credit with Bauhaus frontman Peter Murphy. The highlight of Lift has to be "Party's Not Over" which has a chilling, atmospheric feel.

Produced by Doug DeAngelis (The Pet Shop Boys, New Order) Lift is an excellent mix of rock and electronica. The 12" single (also available on CD) for "Resurrection Hex," which features re-mixes from Deep Dish and KMFDM, compliments the album well, as will the forthcoming "RIP20 C" single which features remixes by Rabbit In the Moon among others and a surprise bonus track courtesy of Roger S.

One would be hard pressed to say that Love and Rockets are at the top of their form with Lift, because Love and Rockets never quite defined their form. Rather than churning out albums indistinguishable from the next and last, Ash, J. and Haskins have dared to do something different every time. Lift may not be their best work, but it close to it.

Finish my antibiotics? Why? I already feel better!

Finishing the entire prescription of antibiotics when a physician prescribes them to you is very important. You need to take the full amount to wipe out all of the bacteria, even if you are feeling better.

When you do not completely finish your antibiotic prescription you are only hurting yourself and the rest of human kind because the bacteria will eventually become resistant to the drug. Therefore, the bacteria will be harder to treat when it reoccurs.

It is also very important not to consume alcohol while you are on antibiotics. Alcohol not only weakens your immune system, but it will counteract the effectiveness of the antibiotics.

HOLY MAN
Directed by Stephen Herek
with Eddie Murphy, Jeff Goldblum, Kelly Preston
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Holy Man takes a tour through the surrealistic, bizarre and often comical world of infomercials — those pesky half–hour long television ads pawned off as regular programming. With such rich fodder to work with, Holy Man still manages to fail in every conceivable way to be even remotely funny.

The movie takes the most stereotypical characters possible, puts them in ridiculously contrived situations, and then deteriorates into a frivolous romance. In fact, the movie never accomplishes any of the numerous and equally pathetic tasks, which it sets out to do.

The movie follows two ad executives, Ricky and Kate, frantically trying to increase the sales of a no-name home shopping network in order to save their jobs. One day, the couple discovers an innocent, wandering evangelist named G. After some pithy scenes about hospitals and hotels, Ricky comes up with the idea to put G on his network to sell products.

From here on, the movie hits all the formulaic plot points. A friendship forms between the bizarre G and the more practical Ricky. Ricky and Kate become romantically involved for no apparent reason. As the movie grinds along, Kate questions using G's spirituality to sell goods, while Ricky ignores these qualms in favor of personal gain. According to the script, a breakup, redemption and reunion follow in that order.

This movie is lacking in so many areas that it is difficult to find a place to start. Jeff Goldblum adds nothing to the greedy, exceedingly shallow

In defense of HSCN: Giving credit where credit is due

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

In the past few weeks, it seems like I have heard a lot of people complaining about the TV that we can receive on campus. It doesn't matter where you go, or what you're reading — someone's bashing HSCN (Housing Service Cable Network). Even with the knowledge that I probably stand alone, I'm here to defend HSCN.

Instead of everyone whining about the HSCN cable line-up, we should be grateful that we have cable at all. There are many prestigious universities that don't have any type of cable system. I'm sure you're thinking that all I'm talking about are all those little schools that no one goes to, and don't even deserve a good cable system.

But what about a little place out in Boston called Harvard? That's right, Harvard University, one of the best colleges in the world, has no cable at all. If you attend Harvard you have to show up with one of those little rabbit ears antennas, and pray that you can pull in the NBC reception from WBZ down the street. Is that what you'd rather have here at UMass? Of course it's not what we want.

We want MTV, we want ESPN, we want HBO. Here's an idea — why don't we call the pay-per-view people and ask them to send a direct signal straight to UMass so that we can get today's best movies delivered straight to our dorm rooms without any hassle. No wait, I've got an even better idea, why doesn't someone call the movie theater at the mall and ask them to broadcast over the airwaves.

Even if Jerry Seinfeld came to campus, and started up his own channel where he did stand up for 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, all 28,000 UMass students would be ignorant enough to say, "I can't believe they only got Jerry Seinfeld. The least they could've done was bring John Belushi back from the dead, and force him to make us laugh."

Why are we all so spoiled? Why do we need to complain about everything? Here's a little secret that you may not have known about how HSCN picks their channel line-up. Let's take an ordinary UMass student from the spring semester of 1998. We'll call this kid Johnny UMass, and go through his daily routine of checking his mail box.

Johnny checks his mailbox to find that there's a survey that was made by a member of a group of students that volunteered to help choose the cable channels for next fall. As a matter of fact, there were quite a few of these surveys sent out by a hard working member of the group to try to get different students' perspectives on what they want to watch. On this survey, there are three questions:

Question 1: What would you do to improve the cable line-up that UMass currently receives?

Question 2: Do you feel that the CNN, Headline News and CNN/SI package is an asset to you and a worthwhile deal?

Question 3: Understanding that MTV is an impossible option due to budget reasons, HSCN has a chance next year to get rid of Much Music to free up some money to use for something else. What is your opinion on this option?

After reading that he can send the survey back to the person who designed it, Johnny answers, respectively, "Change it all because it all sucks." "No, get something better, like ESPN." and "No, get rid of it, it sucks."

Johnny UMass is fake, but the dozens of responses exactly like this that were received after sending out this survey were not only unhelpful, but unacceptable. Because of these answers, HSCN was forced to do some of the things that students said such as losing CNN because it cost so much; indubitably, because of this study, the student body said they didn't want it, but then they complain that they can't get sports scores.

Those woman in charge at HSCN worked extremely hard at getting the Sundance station, which shows quality independent films. Remember last spring when everyone was whining that they couldn't get the WB network because they wanted to see "Dawson's Creek?" HSCN worked hard to get you that, and now you've got it.

It looks like Much Music won't be here much longer either because it was a unanimous student decision that you hated it and wanted to see it go. But when it's gone I suppose that I'll be reading an article in the Collegian that says, "You don't give us MTV and now you're taking Much Music away? Screw you HSCN!"

The bottom line is that students are not going to be pleased. There are specific reasons why we don't get ESPN and MTV. The main reason why UMass can't afford ESPN is because they raised their prices after signing the huge football deal that makes it even more difficult to purchase. The University can't simply raise the fee that students pay because UMass President William Bulger said that he would not increase any fees while he was in office.

HSCN is taking the brunt of a lot of anger that can pretty much be routed back to the students themselves. If you want to be involved in what gets done at HSCN, then you should take a positive helping role instead of just saying that everything is bad, and to get rid of everything. However, I suppose that as long as there's UMass, there will be a campus full of people complaining about pretty much everything. Here's one more option for everyone that hates the programming that HSCN has to offer: Unplug your wire that connects you to HSCN's "awful cable world," and put the rabbit ears on top of the TV.

Maybe if you're lucky you can pick up a signal from a Springfield cable access show run by a couple of high school kids. Ready to plug it back in yet? That's what I though... quit your whining.

character of Ricky. Sure, Goldblum is kind of charming and has a comical sense, and don't forget he's tall, but he can hardly act. The best thing about this casting job was the fact that it avoided Goldblum's usual role as an over intellectualized, nerdy scientist.

Kelly Preston, who plays Kate, is pretty; her role, as the sympathetic romantic lead, never lets her go much beyond this.

Finally, there's the lovable, comedian Eddie Murphy, who takes on the role of G. Eddie is simply not funny, and his somber religious preaching quickly becomes tiresome and just plain annoying.

Conveniently, these two words sum up the rest of the movie. Holy Man lags so much that it resorts to actually showing infomercials as filler in between the flat "action" scenes. Maybe realizing that it is not funny as intended, the movie tries to make poignant points about life through the character of G and his spiritual drivel.

There's actually one scene in which Murphy is preaching his pseudo religious, "treasure life" philosophy directly to the audience. Not only is this scene forced and completely out of place, but the fact that it is being used to sell useless products to an unsuspecting public is disturbing.

In fact, four-fifths of the movie makes the audience believe that mixing spirituality and materialism is the right thing to do. While this may be interpreted as satire by some, I found no evidence to support this statement. The immorality of home shopping networks trying to dupe the public into buying products that they don't want is never attacked.

G never questions Ricky's motives for putting him on the air or his own motives for actually doing the show. The explanation is left at, "well, it makes Ricky happy." While this may seem like a wholesome family thing to say, promoting the exploitation of religious principles and extolling the virtues of greed are far from good ingredients in a supposed "family comedy."

The ever so predictable redemption aspect of the movie doesn't help matters much. Sure, Ricky finally does the right thing by letting G continue his spiritual journey, but he does so for the wrong reason. He fails to acknowledge the iniquity of his ways, but rather has a change of heart because Kate abandons him. It's not about Ricky or Kate or even G. It's about how these networks go about unrestrained promoting materialism to society; the deliverance of that message can be added to the pile of Holy Man's failures.

After watching two hours of mind numbing nothingness, I came to the conclusion that actual infomercials were produced better and were funnier than this movie. If you're looking for comparisons to infomercials though, don't worry. Holy Man was as monotonous, unoriginal, stupid and annoying as any program trying to sell a "ginsu knife." D

New Big Bill Broozny release brings back heart of Windy City

When most people think of the Chicago blues, they refer to Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf and the pool of musicians that followed. Big Bill Broozny was there before any of them.

Born and bred in turn-of-the-century Mississippi, Broozny made his way north in the years following World War I. Though he had had experience playing juke joints in the South, it was not until he came to Chicago and fell under the tutelage of Papa Charlie Jackson that his music took off.

Broozny began to record in 1927, providing a link between the country blues of the Delta and the urban scene of Chicago, for which he laid the foundation.

Legacy has released a good chunk of the Chicago Blues foundation on Broozny's Warm, Witty & Wise as part of their Mojo Workin' series. The album is a re-release of Big Bill's Blues (1988) and Good Time Tonight (1990), with a few tracks not found on either.

Overall, this recording is neither country nor urban blues, but more of a sweet-sounding hybrid of the two.

The trip through the evolution of the music begins in the country with "I Can't Be Satisfied," which exhibits an acoustic guitar style unlike that of any of the Mississippi Delta artists from the 30s. The guitar is steady and consistent, rather than twanging and unkept, and Broozny's vocals are clear and refined.

"Worrying You Off My Mind," further redefines the country blues, keeping in the tradition of a slowed down, rambling guitar, but focuses ing primarily on the bass strings to support Broozny's complex vocal lines. The hard, fast, heavy picking on the bass strings makes "How You Want It Done" unlike any other country blues song ever recorded.

The transition to the city begins with the piano on "Southern Flood Blues." Broozny sings with almost comical candor about water coming in his door, as the piano provides a quirky saloon feel.

"It's A Low Down Dirty Shame," features a sax, piano and electric guitar backing Broozny's vocals, and the sax especially makes this one sound like a vaudeville tune.

The urban feel gets stronger on the boogie woogie "Trucking Little Woman," but seems to climax with Leroy Carr's "Night Time Is the Right Time," a much different version of the song than the Ray Charles recording. The CD then seems to return to the country.

More soulful vocals and heightened percussion on "Baby I Done Got Wise," puts Broozny back In the Delta, as does Bukka White's "New Shake'em On Down." The disk concludes with the mean-hearted "When I Been Drinking," showcasing a very country washboard accompaniment and a lot of personality.

Basically Broozny's guitar style is far more similar to that of a modern bluesman such as Stevie Ray Vaughn or Johnny Winter, rather than mirroring the riff-vacant style of the Mississippi school that includes such immortals as Robert Johnson and Charley Patton. His vocal style is also much different from the other country artists of his era: it is much smoother and has a greater range without relying on howling and moaning.

Broozny's urban transition can be heard in the use of various instruments for accompaniment, but his guitar seems absent from his city blues songs, making them unique from any of the post-war Chicago blues.

Because of his inability to be categorized with either the rural or the urban, Broozny is truly an artist who stands alone in the history of the blues.

After school special

Ian McKellen plays a Nazi war veteran who teaches Brad Renfro the ways of the world in Bryan (Usual Suspects) Singer's Apt Pupil, opening next week.

Stone's struggle starts paying off

LOS ANGELES — Sharon Stone plans to live with her new husband in San Francisco, but that doesn't mean she will neglect her position among Hollywood's most in-demand stars. She has struggled too long to get there.

The actress marked two milestones this year: in March she turned 40; on Valentine's Day, she married Phil Bronstein, 47, executive editor of the San Francisco Examiner.

About the move to the Bay Area, she says she really doesn't like Los Angeles.

"San Francisco is a better life. People there are interested in a much broader spectrum," she says.

Stone seemed to reflect a new maturity and a refreshing candor as she spoke in an interview at a Westside hotel.

Most of today's stars tap dance around any hint of controversy. Not Sharon Stone. She is reminiscent of Bette Davis and Joan Crawford in her willingness to speak out. And like those two immortals, Stone has earned her climb up the ladder.

Born in Meadville, Pa., she recalls wanting to be an actress from the age of 4. Her thrill of the week was watching classic movies on television on Saturday mornings, including the films of Davis and Crawford.

"My father was always barking at me, 'Go outside and play,' but I wanted to stay inside and watch movies. I'm still like that. My husband says, 'You haven't left the house in three days; you should go outside.'"

After winning a hometown beauty contest, she made TV commercials in New York, modeled in Europe and returned to the United States to pursue acting. Woody Allen cast her in a brief but memorable scene in Stardust Memories in 1980. Then she endured a bimbo decade in such films as Police Academy 4 and Action Jackson.

She blames that period on poor agenting, but also her naivete.

"I was a kid from the country. I was getting jobs. I didn't know what to do. I felt I should be grateful for the jobs I was getting, that I could buy a home and pay my bills.

"I was doing exciting things in acting class, and, eventually I just got ashamed. I was doing all this good work in class, and I was doing all this crap on the screen. Well, what is good about that?"

She decided to stop being a good girl and to abandon "the WASPy manners I was brought up with."

At 32 she realized she had to make up for the time she had lost.

Matters improved when she kickboxed Arnold Schwarzenegger in Total Recall. Then came the explosive Basic Instinct with that risque shot in police interrogation.

Although the film placed her in the top ranks, she remains angry with the director, Dutchman Paul Verhoeven.

"I hated him for showing the world up my skirt," said Stone. "I hated him for making me believe that I could go out on a limb. I didn't have a net, he wasn't watching my back. You expect to be able to freewheel as much as you want, because you expect the director to protect you.

"I really thought that was our agreement. As a mature artist, I agree that shot was the best choice for the movie. I really disagree with the way he got it. Because, it made me look incredibly stupid when I was very, very willing to do what it took to be that character.

"It would have been better if he had brought me into the editing room and shown me the scene and explained why he did it. But he showed it to me in a roomful of strangers. That was him trying to create a cruel, inappropriate power over me. That hurt me a lot."

"That scene" had people talking across the country and throughout the world. Her stardom established, Stone followed with Sliver, which created no talk at all.

"I never thought Sliver was a good picture. I never really wanted to do it," she says. "But my agent at the time was the agent of Joe Eszterhas (who wrote the script). I didn't really understand that game.

"I trusted [the agent] more than I should have. Joe was supposed to do a lot of rewrites that never happened. I was so new to the game that I didn't know I could just say no."

She agreed to "Sliver" with the proviso that her agent push for Intersection with Richard Gere. That happened, and she followed with an action film with Sylvester Stallone, The Specialist, and a Western, The Quick and the Dead, produced by her own company.

She was cast in Casino, opposite Robert De Niro. The Martin Scorsese film brought her an Academy Award nomination, a Golden Globe and a bundle of respect.

She followed with a bad choice: Diabolique, a poor remake of the 1955 French classic thriller that starred Simone Signoret, who won accolades from critics and audiences alike. Playing the same role of the conniving mistress, Stone was trounced.

Always aiming for surprise, the actress has abandoned her wicked ways to play the loving mother of a disabled boy in The Mighty.

It's a secondary role to a pair of 13-year-olds (Kieran Culkin, Elden Henson) who form an odd friendship to defy their young tormentors.

"I always try to do something that I haven't done before," she says. "I think it's appropriate to play moms and to play people who have life experiences. I'm not an ingenue anymore. I think it's time for me to invest some of my own life into my work.

"It's interesting to play psychopaths and villains because they're without boundaries. That's kind of sensationalistically entertaining. But I reached a point where it's not as rewarding to me, it's not as much fun."

Quick but not dead

Sharon Stone takes on a new role in the upcoming film, The Mighty.

Despite poor ratings, "Faro" intrigues

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — After the much-hyped drama "Felicity," the best-reviewed new fall series has been CBS' "Buddy Faro." Two more wildly different shows would be hard to imagine.

While WB's "Felicity" is all youthful earnestness and angst, "Buddy Faro" is carefree adult fun, and the only apparent subtext is this: "Hey, it's Friday, it's been a tough week and you, the TV viewer, deserve a smooth, easy-to-swallow nightcap."

So here is middle-aged sexy Dennis Farina as private eye Faro, who dropped out of the mainstream in the 1970s after his doll got rubbed out by a mobster. But he's back now and ready to party — and we don't mean rock 'n' roll.

Buddy is stuck in a time warp of martinis, vintage Sinatra and hipster digs with neon-bright decor. But he still has his charm and P.I. chops, and he's willing to play mentor to young detective Bob Jones, played by an engaging Frank Whaley.

Farina and Whaley have so much chemistry, they may be the season's best non-couple, surpassing even the gay nun, straight woman non-couple in NBC's sitcom "Will & Grace."

Viewers haven't yet flocked to "Buddy Faro," which ranked a lackluster No. 70 in the latest Nielsen ratings. The show has faced tough competition from baseball play-off games on NBC, but was outpointed one week by ABC's "Sabrina the Teenage Witch."

Could "Buddy Faro" be falling quick victim to the dreaded "Moonlighting" syndrome, the 1980's detective series that offered a charming Bruce Willis-Cybill Shepherd relationship off-set by pointless plots?

The second "Faro" episode, despite a wry, self-spoofing turn by George Hamilton, was weak. This week's story (9 p.m. Friday) is meatier, and does better in capitalizing on Buddy's bemusement at '90s life (he declines lobster at a basketball game with a plaintive, "Could I just get maybe a hot dog and a beer?").

The big-money sports world comes in for satirical jabs as Buddy and Bob take on a case involving an out-of-control basketball star and end up with a murder to solve. Marcus Allen, Mary Lou Retton and Phil Simms are among the athletes making cameo appearances.

Characterize "Buddy Faro" as amusing fluff and its creator, Mark Frost, is not insulted; the series is not trying to be another "Law & Order" or "Homicide: Life on the Street."

It was "born out of my desire to bring a sense of fun and high style back to hour drama," Frost said.

other recent dance trends is that there's a whole atmosphere to it. If you've ever been to a swing club, you'll know right away. The costumes are bouncy, the people are bouncy. Everything's bouncy. Part of has to do with the music — and the names are worth the price of purchase alone. Big Bad Voodoo Daddy, Cherry Poppin' Daddies, Squirrel Nut Zippers. Mixing a jazzy feel with big band orchestrations, swing music is lighter and classier than, say, the macarena.

I tried swing dancing once, and failed horribly. It's not something you can pick up in one night. Those flips and dips you see in the Gap ad — don't try those at home, unless, of course, you're looking for an easy way to get rid of your date.

Like all social dances, the art is a combination of leading and following. Graceful, rhythmic couples need to be completely in sync, the leader assured yet spontaneous, the follower anticipating every next move. If you're new at this, avoid dancing next to a window.

Even if you're a guy, following can be a helpful way to learn some of the basic moves. Working with a basic eight count, swing alternates slow and quick steps with a variety of glides, twists and turns. Body language and arm movements are equally important: the back is slightly hunched and arms appropriately swing with the body.

As social dance began to gain popularity at the turn of the century, a new style of music, ragtime, took the nation by storm in the "Roaring 20s." Jazz and swing would soon combine, attracting big bands, large dance halls and acrobatic dancers called jitterbugs, lindy-hoppers (named after Charles Lindbergh) and swingers.

As one might imagine, the different styles of swing are as numerous as haters of Hanson. There's West Coast Swing and East Coast Swing, the litterbug, the Lindy-Hop, the Balboa, the Dallas Push, the Carolina Shag and the Beach Bop. What dance you engage in is often entirely dependant on the geographic region, but popularity is widespread. West Coast Swing is the official state dance of California.

Appropriately, as we reach the turn of the new century, social dance is once again leading the way among young men and women everywhere. If you're interested, lessons are frequently available on the UMass campus, as well as in Northampton.

by confidence, and when he talks it isn't full of the strange non-sequiturs his friend Trent uses for attention ("Take note: this is the guy behind the guy ... behind the guy," he tells a waitress in Vegas). His confidence then translates into a smooth session of swing dancing to the sounds of Big Bad Voodoo Daddy (or one of those "Daddy" bands). And what is Trent, the alpha male, left with? A pocketful of numbers he can't place with names, and an embarrassing moment where he tries to make eyes with a mother who's actually trying to entertain her baby. And that's where we leave Trent, while Mike has finally forgotten his girlfriend and is looking forward to a date with the girl from the Brown Derby.

The movie, when it came out a few years ago, was seen as riding a crest of "alpha male-ism." It was seen as crying out for a time when men were men, boys (ahem, Mike) were boys and girls were "dames." But to say this ignores the subtext of the movie. Who we can argue, is happier in the end, Mike or Trent? It has to be Mike, who wasn't just rejected by mommy. And what about all of the homoerotic banter between Trent and Sue? We all know what Freud would have to say about that. And yes, Sue is a male (the name is blamed on his father's love for Johnny Cash – ah, the man in black), which adds another wrinkle to their relationship.

For a movie that is labelled as one of the precursors to the now-in-session swing revival, there actually isn't much swing dancing. Just the one scene at the Brown Derby in Los Angeles. The "swingers" that the title implies is geared more to their attitude, which actually resembles the Rat Pack, and the clothes they wear. There they are, Mike and Trent, strolling through a Las Vegas casino, with their swank suits and ties. There they are, using their coded language of "money" ("You don't know how money you are," Trent tells Mike) and "babies." There they are being led in the back door of the Derby, in an overt (and foreshadowed) reference to the Copacabana scene in Goodfellas.

But for all of their coolness, they are viewed, at times, as pathetic. One part of the movie copies blatantly (and, in fact, announces it) Reservoir Dogs, giving us the impression — stressing, actually — that their cool doesn't spring so much from originality as from imitation. Earlier on, in the Vegas scene, Mike and Trent bicker like a couple on when exactly to double down in blackjack. Later on, they end up playing at the five-dollar table, among some shifty company. This is after all of the rules Mike lays out, like how to get free stuff and what kind of drink to order ("Single malt whiskey, not a double, on the rocks) — stuff he seems to have gotten out of GQ or Details. This is cool by committee, voted on by a board of editors.

In all, the movie is a lot deeper than just sipping martinis and wearing thin ties. I'm not sure if this is by accident or if it were actually planned, but it parallels nicely today's fads. Looking back on past styles for today's, we are all too willing to absorb the past for camp value, and therefore style. When you look at swing night at the Brown Derby, you wonder how empty it will be in a few years, and how packed breakdancing at MC Hammer night will be ("What pair of harem pants will I wear tonight?").

I'm probably reading way too much into Swingers, but held under the light of fashion and romance, it asks some pertinent questions. In today's world, is anything organic? Or is everything by committee? Do we have to call the people we just met at a bar after two days ("It's factory standard," they tell Mike.)? Oh, such large questions from such a seemingly simple movie. Maybe you should just rent Fire Down Below instead.

Swingers is now playing at the Pleasant Street Theater in Northampton.

TROY, N.Y. — An honor student, a full-time graduate student, a corporate executive and the second best Division III rusher in the country got together the other day in the silence of RPI's library.

In one cubicle. In one seat. Krishaun Gilmore is this modern Rennaisance man, kind of The Flash meets Dilbert.

He averages 207 yards rushing a game — fourth best all-time in Division III. He's using his fourth year of eligibility at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute to play football and set some records, like an NCAA mark in the 55-meter dash.

But the daily grind of football practice, the tedious review of game films, the Saturdays of games and Sundays of pain are important to him.

Sort of.

This 22-year-old has his priorities. On the long list, football sits no higher than third. After all, the guy is a researcher for General Electric Co., has to field those pesky full-time job offers, and is taking a full load for his master's degree, mostly paid by an academic fellowship.

And, oh yeah, he's one of the best football players ever to play small college football.

"You have to put it in perspective," Gilmore said of football, which comes after school and his job. "Football is something I enjoy, something I like to be part of. And," the 5-10, 195-pounder laughed, "there aren't any pro scouts knocking on my door. But in all seriousness, it's the master's degree that is the reason I'm here."

Four games into this undefeated season he has 829 yards as RPI continues the nation's third longest Division III winning streak at 13. In all of last year, when RPI won its fourth Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference title, Gilmore had 988 yards.

"He's got unbelievable speed," said senior linebacker Kyle Hair, one of the co-captains with Gilmore. "But this year he's put on 20 pounds. He's just as fast, but this year he's strong... he drives people now."

In the first two games this year, Gilmore averaged more than 9 yards a carry, scored five touchdowns and caught three passes. Against Kean State he ran for 228 yards on 14 carries, including four touchdowns.

He's been clocked at 4.3 and 4.2 in the 40-yard dash. That's NFL speed and two-tenths of a click faster than a fast running back in Division III.

"A lot of guys at first saw him as a track guy who ran fast and then out of bounds," said head coach Joe King. "But I tell people, 'This guy's a football player.' He's a better runner inside."

Gilmore smiles at that, but takes little credit.

"It's the philosophy my parents beat into my head, that you get out of anything what you put into it. Being mediocre is hard to swallow... either I've tried to be spectacular and fell on my face, or I did that little extra effort and succeeded."

Take Thursdays:

- 7 a.m., he's at one of his three work days at GE's Research and Development Center, where he works as a finance control specialist.
- 1 p.m., he heads back to RPI's gym to review game films.
- 3 p.m., he goes to the training room for physical therapy and taping.
- 4 p.m. to 6:30 p.m., he attends practice but leaves 15 minutes early for class.
- 6:30 p.m. to 9:30 p.m., attends Technological Innovation and International Change graduate class.
- 9:30 p.m.-11:30 p.m., meets with his study group.

"When you meet him you can just see his work ethic," King said. "Krishaun is from a blue-collar family, and I mean that in the best way. His parents both work and it's a strong family situation... the kid has trained non-stop as long as I have known him. No one works harder in the weight room and he's probably the best blocker on the team."

Gilmore says the key is simple: "It all comes down to discipline, for me."

It's a subject about which he knows much.

When he was 11, he and four friends were throwing rocks at a stack of boxes and wood debris behind a store. A woman called the police. One of the other kids got mouthy. The cops took him away. That was the last time Gilmore ever spoke to the friend.

"He was off limits for me and my parents never let me back there," he said.

Growing up a loner in suburban East Greenbush, Gilmore was one of the few African-Americans in the town.

His parents — Thomas is a contractor and Lucille is an Amtrak supervisor — worked to send Krishaun to Catholic schools in nearby Albany.

In the city he made and kept friends since kindergarten. Sometimes, though, he sees an old friend on the street corner or at a mall hanging out, some stoned, some angling to get that way. They were among his greatest teachers, never learning the lesson they taught him so well.

"Growing up I didn't know what I wanted to be, but I knew what I didn't want to be," Gilmore said.

One friend was a teammate in football and track and his constant rival in spelling bees. Then something happened.

"Kids started to drop off," he said. "They were just hanging out. I saw where they were going and I went the other way."

UCLA & Oregon set to do battle

By Richard Rosenblatt
Associated Press

Oregon certainly won't be sneaking up on No. 2 UCLA.

"I spent six years as offensive coordinator there and they're still using a lot of the same things," UCLA coach Bob Toledo says. "When I watch them now, it's like looking in the mirror."

Which means there should be plenty of points in Pasadena when the 11th-ranked Ducks waddle into the Rose Bowl to play the Bruins. It's conceivable the teams could combine for 100 points and 1,000 yards.

Oregon (5-0, 2-0 Pac-10) and UCLA (4-0, 2-0) rank 2-3 nationally in scoring, with the Ducks at 50.6 points per game, and the Bruins at 48 points. The Ducks, led by the passing of Akili Smith and running of Reuben Droughns, average 534.3 yards per game. The Bruins, with Cade McNown at the controls, are at 485.3 yards.

"UCLA has all the ingredients to be a great team," Oregon coach Mike Bellotti said. "And we have staked a claim to that, too. We'll find out more about that this weekend."

For the Bruins, tailback Jermaine Lewis returns after a one-game suspension for his involvement in an off-campus fight. But he won't start, as Keith Brown and freshman DeShaun Foster were more than capable replacements. They ran for two touchdowns apiece and combined for 209 yards on 29 carries in UCLA's 52-28 win at Arizona.

McNown, who last week failed to reach 200 yards passing for the first time in 19 games, is trying to correct a flaw in his throwing motion.

"He's a better thrower, but he's not throwing the ball better right now," Toledo said of his left-handed quarterback, who has hit on just 49.4 percent of his passes in the last three games after completing 60.6 percent last season.

Droughns is the Pac-10's leading rusher with 652 yards (7.5 per carry) and eight touchdowns. The 6-foot, 205-pound junior college transfer, ran for 217 yards and four TDs in Oregon's 51-29 rout of Washington State last week.

Smith, meanwhile, has joined the list of Heisman Trophy contenders with his play. The 6-3, 215-pound senior leads the nation in passing efficiency with a 196.3 rating. Smith has thrown for 1,418 yards and 15 TDs as the Ducks shoot for their first 6-0 starts since 1964.

NBA scrutinizing union's tax proposal

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The NBA's negotiating team spent yesterday studying the union's luxury tax proposal to see if it will actually slow the growth of player salaries.

Plugging in the numbers, one thing quickly became clear: As presently constituted, the formula would produce only a trickle of "tax revenue."

"We are going to examine every element of this tax to see whether under some circumstance, at the right levels and in the right amounts, a tax could work," commissioner David Stern said.

If the owners latch onto the concept and adopt the tax system in a counterproposal tomorrow, it could signal that the sides have found an acceptable mechanism for solving the biggest rift between them — a new economic operating system for the next collective bargaining agreement.

The lockout is now 3 1/2 months old, and the league took the unprecedented step Tuesday of canceling the first two weeks of the season.

Both sides are awaiting a ruling from arbitrator John Feerick on the union's grievance over whether more than 200 players with guaranteed contracts should be paid during the lockout.

Feerick's decision, which could have a major impact on the negotiations, is due by Sunday.

The union made its tax proposal Tuesday, indicating to owners that they are willing to give ground to get the season started. The tax would theoretically be a deterrent against owners signing their own free agents to overly lucrative long-term contracts.

Stern and deputy commissioner Russ Granik said the tax proposal was far from a breakthrough, yet they seemed surprised nonetheless that the union was offering a way to control superstar salaries.

"Amongst the players who came into town and spent a couple of days here, I think there was a sense on their part that they were making a new offer that was different and might be designed to make some progress," Stern said. "We want to make sure that we've analyzed it every possible way to show our good faith here."

Under the union's offer, a 50 percent tax would be levied on the amount of any annual salary over $18 million, with the tax money to be redistributed to low-revenue teams.

Jags' DB Logan fined by league

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Jaguars safety Mike Logan was fined $20,000 by the NFL on yesterday for his helmet-to-helmet hit on Dan Marino in Monday night's game against the Miami Dolphins.

There was no suspension to go along with the fine. Logan planned to appeal, claiming the hit was illegal but not intentional. It was Logan's first offense in two years in the NFL.

Tiger Woods battles illness in Scotland's Dunhill Cup

By Stephen Wade
Associated Press

VIRGINIA WATER, England — Tiger Woods and Mark O'Meara are fighting a flu bug, and the dank British weather is not helping. They're both on antibiotics and hoping the rain abates for their opening matches in the 12-man World Match Play Championship at the Wentworth Club.

They'll get another day to recover before tomorrow's quarterfinals. As two of the four seeded players, they drew byes for the start of play today. Woods got sick in Scotland last week at the Dunhill Cup. O'Meara was fighting the flu and sinus problems when he arrived at St. Andrews from Florida.

The other two byes went to Vijay Singh, the top seed and defending champion, and Ernie Els, the three-time champion. The bye is especially important considering the demands of the event, which calls for 36 holes daily.

"Eight rounds in four days is a lot of golf on this kind of golf course, where it's wet and soft," Woods said. "Only playing six rounds is a distinct advantage, no doubt about it."

In the first round, it's Steve Stricker vs. Patrick Sjoland, Colin Montgomerie vs. Thomas Bjorn, Lee Westwood vs. Stuart Appleby and Darren Clarke vs. Ian Woosnam.

Woods, sniffling and clearing his throat, suggested yesterday he plays well when he feels bad. And he still managed to crack a joke.

"I had the flu at Disney (1996) with a 102-degree fever and I shot 66 to win the tournament," he said. "When I got home my fever was 104.2.

"Anybody who is sick usually plays well," he added. "You conserve yourself a little bit better, you expect less of yourself. When you're sick, you often see guys with their best rounds." Then he dead-panned: "I'm not that pleased. Better you had it than me."

O'Meara, despite a daily regimen of six or seven vitamins begun 18 months ago, is not up to speed.

"It's no big deal," he said. "It's really the first time I haven't felt well in a year and a half."

"Tiger's got the potential here, but he's got his work cut out if he wants to win this — just like everybody else.'

Woods is the No. 1 ranked player in the world, a rating based on stroke play.

"I consider myself up there in match play with some other guys like Ernie, Vijay, obviously," said Woods, who is playing this event for the first time.

"I like the one-on-one, the head-to-head," he added. "In professional golf you don't get this chance very often. There are only a couple per year where you go head-to-head in match play." Wentworth's tree-lined, narrow fairways favor straight hitters. And the soft, flat greens should lend themselves to U.S.-style target golf, a turnaround from last week's links golf at St. Andrews.

Els is again a favorite, although he said his game "isn't quite where it was last year." The South African won three straight (1994-96) and lost to Singh in last year's final.

"I've been in the finals four straight times and I don't want to let go," he said. "I've had a good run on this course and in this tournament."

Els will face Westwood or Appleby in the quarterfinals, with Woods looming in the semifinals — if Woods can get by Clarke or two-time winner Woosnam in the quarters.

Would he relish a Woods-Els match?

"No, not really," Els said. "I wouldn't say I'm running scared or anything, but he's a very good match player and tough to beat."

New York Yankees to be rested–up for Series start

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bad news for the National League: The Yankees will be well-rested when the World Series starts Saturday night. Not that New York needed any more advantages, what with an AL-record 114 wins, the home-field advantage and the rabid fans of the Bronx Zoo.

"Hopefully we can wrap it up in four," David Wells said early yesterday in the glow of the Yankees' record 35th American League pennant. "That would be the best thing to do."

As the autumn sun splashed down on Yankee Stadium, players took a day off following the 9-5 victory over Cleveland that won the AL championship series 4-2.

There was talk some players would go to Atlantic City, N.J., last night, and who could blame them? The Yankees' number has come up just about every time this year.

"To me, this is probably the tensest part, getting here," manager Joe Torre said. "The World Series, if we win the World Series, it will be magnificent and we will celebrate. But getting there is a such a tough mountain to climb, and to have been able to do that against a club like the Cleveland Indians, who have been there so often, it is just very satisfying."

New York, second in the AL with a .288 batting average, won the pennant despite a .218 average in the six games against the Indians. After scoring five runs in the first inning of the opener, New York was just 6-for-59 (.154) with runners in scoring position through Game 5. The Yankees then went 4-for-12 in Game 6.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — There's no reason for you to think that the day will offer anything more glamorous than usual. Image is relative.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — Some may think you're boring today, but don't let them distract you from being centered on your goal.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — If things get rough today, others will turn to you for guidance. Also expect to be contacted on a "new level" after dark.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Watch your finances today with greater vigor and discipline. Keep yourself from making the mistakes that will set you back.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Other people will feel that they can turn to you for advice today. Are you feeling up to the task? Perhaps you need someone to lean on.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — Focus on what is reliable today. Don't get mixed up in anything that was hastily put together.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — There's a difference between saving and hoarding. It's important that you maintain a healthy balance of the two.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — You'll be more interested in doing things for others today. Perhaps you feel that you don't deserve pampering.

QB Collins not cut out for the NFL

Hi, my name is Kerry Collins, quarterback of the Carolina Panthers. Wait, this just in, Kerry Collins really isn't a National Football League quarterback, nor will he ever be again.

This is the least of the Carolina's (0–5) worries. This weekend's 27–20 loss to the Cowboys keeps the Panthers winless through five games.

Paul Teves on the NFL

Collins went to coach Dom Capers and said that he just wasn't into it any more. I hope that Collins feels that way about his career, because now he'll never get another starting gig anywhere in the NFL.

The other major news coming out of the NFC West involves this weekend's 31–0 rout that the 49ers (4–1) gave the Saints. But I had told you they were still the 'Ainta (3–2).

The Falcons (4–1) also made a statement by disposing of the New York "Football" Giants (2–4). The Falcons sit tied atop the NFC West with the Niners.

In the worst division in football, the NFC East, the Cowboys look to be running away with it, but watch out for those Cardinals (3–3), still my sleeper to win the division. Jake Plummer and company will blast the Giants this weekend in the Meadowlands.

The Philadelphia Eagles (1–5) have a shot at winning two in a row with Rodney Peete at the helm, but don't let that fool you. He's played the Redskins and will play the Chargers this weekend.

Speaking of the hopeless 'Skins, they will drop to 0–7 this weekend when they are forced to play the Minnesota Vikings (5–0). Hopefully Randall Cunningham will play two quarters in this game, but the game might be so out of reach by the end of the first quarter that coach Dennis Green might be running the option by the second quarter.

Minnesota will hold the lead in the NFC Central for at least one more week because they won't lose this week.

The Green Bay Packers (4–1) should be able to get back on track tonight with a win against the Lions (1–4), but you never know when Barry Sanders might explode for 200 yards. If the Pack contains Sanders, they will win big.

The other news coming out of the Central is that Tampa Bay (2–3) might fight back into the divisional hunt as it squares off against the winless and Collins-less, Panthers.

In the AFC West the Broncos continue to dominate at 6–0, but this week they get a much needed rest just to make sure that Mr. Incredible, John Elway, comes back 100 percent for the game against Jacksonville in two weeks.

The Kansas City Chiefs (4–2) will also get a week to allow Elvis Grbac to get more snaps for their date with the Steelers in two weeks. The Oakland Raiders (4–2) are the other team battling for the division title early on but they are sure to fall off when they play a hot Cincinnati team in two weeks, regardless of whether or not coach Jon Gruden is sober.

Jacksonville (5–0) is still undefeated heading into their contest with Buffalo this weekend, the Jags should struggle a little with both James Stewart and Fred Taylor out of the starting line up, but Tavian Banks ran for 75 yards on nine carries against the Dolphins.

The most interesting thing going on in the AFC Central is that the Bengals (2–3) are playing the Oilers (2–3) and the Steelers (3–2) are matched up with the Ravens (2–3). The battles will allow the division to clear up, or maybe cloud up.

In the AFC East there is really only one game that matters, The New York Jets (2–3) and the New England Patriots (4–1). There is only one thing to expect when these two teams get together and that is a lopsided victory for the Patriots, just have Bill Parcells and Vinny Testaverde ask the Chiefs. Actually the Jets are still reeling from a 30–10 loss to Tony Banks and the Rams? That can't be right, but it is.

The picks this week are guaranteed. The Jaguars face the Bills and despite Flutie's efforts, the Jaguars will easily cover a three point spread. Rich Stadium or not.

Another game you must take is the three points being offered to the Eagles. The Eagles might be one of the worst teams in football, but this week they face a team just a little bit worse.

The Vikings have a 13 1/2 point spread but don't worry they're playing the Redskins. The Vikings will win this game at home by at least three touchdowns.

Finally, I'll put my 1–0 Monday night record to the test when I take the Pats minus 6 1/2 points over the Jets. The Tuna is still wondering what happen last week, there's no way to stop Drew Bledsoe this season. Oh yeah, that's right Robert Edwards is doing pretty good you can keep the injured Curtis Martin.

Cook a solid addition to UM soccer team

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

When Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy got Cincinnati native Sarah Cook to come and play in Amherst, one might have considered it to be the best steal since the Europeans bought the island of Manhattan from the Native Americans for 24 dollars in beads and trinkets back in the 1600s.

The former Sycamore High and Club Ohio standout had several other offers to play Division I soccer, and with hometown school and Atlantic 10 rival Xavier University stationed right in her backyard, it seemed logical that Cook might end up a Musketeer.

However, in the end, Cook and UMass turned out to be the perfect fit.

"I liked UMass because of the tradition that it had," Cook said. "[The choice] was easy with all of those Atlantic 10 titles and NCAA tournament appearances."

Now, three-quarters of the way into her inaugural campaign, Cook has been a stabilizing force in the midfield for the Minutewomen. A starter in 11 of 13 games this year, this left-footed threat has been a welcome addition to the UMass squad.

"We're just so happy that she's here. She has added a lot to the team this year," Rudy said. "We would be diminished without her."

Cook had been experiencing smooth sailing in her transition to college soccer until last Sunday, when she suffered a minor ankle sprain in a 5–0 win over Virginia Tech. Although the injury seemed to be serious at the time, it shouldn't keep Cook out of the lineup tomorrow night when she will return to her hometown to face those same Xavier Musketeers.

"When it first happened I was really upset because I didn't think I was going to be able to play this weekend. Now it looks like I'm going to play," Cook said. "I'm psyched for this weekend because playing at Xavier is like playing at my home field. I know all of the girls on [Xavier's] team, and I'm ready to win."

The Cincinnati native has also been a one of the contributors from a standout freshman class that Rudy brought in for this season. Now, however, Cook finally feels settled into her role on the team, one that she was determined to get: a starting job in the midfield.

"It's a lot faster game here, but that makes it more fun to play. You always have to think before you make your the play," she said. "One of my individual goals was to start, and I knew I was going to work my ass off try to be a starter."

Said Rudy: "Of all of the freshmen that we brought in here, we felt that she had the best chance of starting right away. She was totally prepared to come to college and play Division I soccer."

This season has been a change for Cook, as well as practically all of her teammates, in the win department. For a player who has had success at practically every level, it has also been an adjustment to deal with the tough times this year.

"It's been a little frustrating, but I haven't lost confidence in my teammates or coaches," Cook said. "We know it will all come together. We'll get back on track and live up to that tradition."

In addition, Rudy feels that field skills that Cook has brought with her here to UMass have been everything that he expected, and more.

"She has a great attitude, a wonderful personality, a high work rate, is cooperative, and has speed, fighting power and skill," said Rudy, almost as if he was reading it off a shopping list. "On a coach's wish list, that is what he or she looks for. It's a hell of a package."

Now, as UMass' Atlantic 10 tournament and NCAA tournament fates hang in the balance this weekend, Cook and the Minutewomen are well aware of the task at hand. Xavier will enter the weekend with a 5–5–1 mark, 3–1–1 in the A–10, while Dayton sports a 9–3 record, 5–0 in the conference.

"If we don't beat both of those teams this weekend, then it's going to make it a lot more difficult to make the A–10 tournament," Cook said.

But don't expect Cook and her teammates to go down without a fight.

Water polo wins 3, loses a tough match

By Alexander Wood
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's water polo team went three-for- four in last weekend's CWPA tournament, defeating Iona, the United States Merchant Marines Academy and Lehman College. However, the sole loss of the weekend was a bitter one, coming at the hands of rival Queens.

In Saturday's action the Minutemen continued their winning ways, handing Iona a 13–4 pounding. The second game of the day brought Queens into the pool, where UMass was dealt a 6–12 letdown. The loss halted the Minutemen's winning streak at 10 and put their overall record at 15–2, with both losses being dealt by Queens.

The loss was a tough pill for the UMass squad to swallow following the Oct. 3 game with Queens in which two Minuteman players were attacked and hospitalized by Queens' players.

"We lost the game but I was very proud of the way my guys behaved," coach Russ Yarworth said.

However, the loss was only a minor setback for the Minutemen, as they swam on to sink the Merchant Marines 18–6 and hammer out a 13–4 victory over Lehman College on Sunday.

"It's always a good sign that a team can take control of a game that they're supposed to, and not let it get out of control," Yarworth said.

The Minutemen won't have too much time to dwell on their second loss of the season, as they will be back in action this week.

"Queens was the better team that day, but let's wait 'till the end of the season to see who's champs,"

Packers and Lions prepare for contest tonight in Detroit

By Harry Atkins
Associated Press

PONTIAC, Mich. — The last thing the Detroit Lions wanted was an angry Brett Favre. He's tough enough when content.

The Lions (1-4) desperately need a victory tonight when they face Favre and the Green Bay Packers (4-1) in a critical NFC Central matchup.

Yes, critical.

The Packers, after a 37-24 loss to undefeated Minnesota on Monday night, don't want to fall any further behind the Vikings. The Lions, who already have lost three divisional games, can't afford any more losses.

Against the Vikings, Favre was 13-of-23 for 114 yards, with no touchdowns and three interceptions.

"I had guys open and I missed them, and I made some throws I wish I had back," he said. "It's hard to sleep at night. When you don't have a game the next week, it makes it even tougher because I'm ready to go play right away."

He now goes to a stadium where he has known plenty of heartache — to say nothing of headaches.

Favre has thrown 14 interceptions against 12 touchdown passes in the Pontiac Silverdome. Last season, he had an ugly day there, throwing three interceptions, including one from his knees that linebacker Reggie Brown returned for a score. The Lions won 26-15.

"We just had a game plan and everything clicked, and we got it done," Detroit defensive end Robert Porcher said. "That's what we have to do this week."

This is the second meeting of the season between these rivals. In the season opener, at Lambeau Field, Favre was superb. He completed 24 of 32 for 277 yards and two touchdowns with one interception, spreading the ball around to eight receivers. The Packers won 38-19.

"He is a dynamite quarterback," Porcher said. "He is, I think, the best of what he does because he's able to get out of a lot of things, and he makes a lot of things happen.

"But the flip side of that is that if you put a hat on him, he becomes very ordinary. If you keep hitting him and knocking him around. And that is what we're planning on doing."

Favre has thrown six interceptions in Green Bay's last two games. Coach Mike Holmgren suggested that Favre might be pressing, trying to do too much by himself.

"Well, I always try to do too much," Favre said. "This is just my own opinion, but I think every player who plays this game should look at it the way I do: If I don't do too much, who will?"

Green Bay plans to create a little defensive havoc, too, most of it aimed at confusing rookie Lions quarterback Charlie Batch. In his first three starts since replacing Scott Mitchell, Batch has seen defenses stack eight and nine men near the line, daring the rookie to beat them with his passing.

Not surprisingly, Batch — a second-round draft pick out of Eastern Michigan — has struggled.

In the fourth quarter of a 31-27 upset loss at Chicago, the Lions couldn't generate a first down on three possessions. Yet he is No. 12 in the NFC with a rating of 68.7. Batch has thrown two touchdown passes with two interceptions. That's better than Peyton Manning or Ryan Leaf, the first and second draft picks.

"That's the reason why those guys have 12 and 14 interceptions, because they're forcing the ball," Packers safety LeRoy Butler said. "Batch does not force the ball. He does not make a whole lot of mental errors on the run and it's hard to confuse him."

Minutewomen slip past PC despite wet grass and rain

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

These days, not even Mother Nature can stop the Massachusetts field hockey team, which captured its fourth consecutive victory yesterday with a 1–0 nudging of host Providence College despite 70 minutes of torrential downpours.

"It was pouring rain and the field was almost like a hockey rink," said UMass coach Patty Shea of the game conditions. "The footing was bad, and it was hard to make sharp cuts."

In addition to the inclement weather, the Minutewomen also contended with the natural grass surface of Hendrickson Field, making the contest a low-scoring affair.

Sophomore forward Kristen Schmidt notched the game's lone goal and eventual game-winner at the 28:55 mark in the first half.

"We had a free hit during an attack on the left side," said Shea, while describing Schmidt's score. "Kristen managed to redirect a deflection into the goal. It was actually a very pretty goal."

Although regular UMass (8–5) netminder Zowie Tucker had allowed only one goal in her last three starts, back-up goalkeeper Michelle Crooks started between the pipes, making 10 saves en route to the third straight Minutewoman shutout. Friar goalie Andrea Weyl kept her pesky team in the game, turning away 15 of the 16 shots on goal.

"Providence (3–11) played a great game. We had some opportunities that we couldn't convert and it kept things close," said Shea. "They're a really young team that took it to us at some points, and we took it to them at some points. We put a goal in (the net) in the first half and our defense held up for the rest of the game."

Only 24 hours removed from Tuesday's 3–0 victory over Syracuse, the Minutewomen had little time to catch their breath before traveling to Providence. Despite the lack of time for both preparation and rest, Shea believes that her squad remained focused partly because of the fact that it had no time to even consider a letdown.

"I think they'd rather play a game than practice," said Shea of her players. "When you do things this way, you really don't have time to think and I think they played well on the grass surface, given the conditions."

After opening the 1998 campaign with a 1–3 mark, UMass has stormed back, winning seven of its last nine games, and moving three games over the .500 mark for the first time this fall.

"I feel that the players now have a lot of confidence and believe that they can compete with any team," said

Padres head to World Series; will meet Yankees Saturday

NEW YORK (AP) — There are plenty of intriguing matchups as the Padres and Yankees prepare to meet in the World Series starting Saturday night at Yankee Stadium.

There's San Diego native David Wells, pitching Game 1 for New York. There's Jim Leyritz, the former Yankees postseason hero now playing the same role for the Padres.

There's Hideki Irabu, who refused to pitch for the Padres and held out until he was traded to New York. And San Diego slugger Greg Vaughn, nearly sent to the Yankees until they nixed the deal last year.

Not to mention the other former New Yorkers playing for the Padres — Sterling Hitchcock, Brian Boehringer and also Ruben Rivera, whose cousin is Yankees closer Mariano Rivera. And even Homer Bush, sent from San Diego to the Yankees in the Irabu trade.

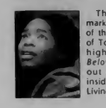
Plus, don't forget ol' Zim. Yankees bench coach Don Zimmer was the second manager in Padres' history, wearing one of those those ugly mustard-and-brown uniforms in the early '70s.

All that, and a lot more.

Tony Gwynn, one of the greatest hitters in history at 38, visiting baseball's most famous stadium for the first time in his life. Kevin Brown and Trevor Hoffman trying to tame the majors' highest-scoring team. The Padres going after their first World Series championship.

October vets David Cone and Derek Jeter, plus rookies Orlando "El Duque" Hernandez and Shane Spencer. New York hoping to do it for cancer-stricken Darryl Strawberry and enhance its reputation as one of the best teams ever. The Yankees trying to win their record 24th title and second in three seasons.

Wells, the MVP of the six-game AL championship series win over Cleveland, can hardly wait to face his hometown team. He'll almost certainly face Brown in the opener.



"That is where I am from," Wells said early yesterday, before San Diego beat Atlanta 5-0 in the clinching Game 6 of the NLCS. "That is where I grew up. It would be exciting for me, a challenge for me as well. I am pulling for the Padres."

The Padres earned their way to Yankee Stadium, beating a pair of 100-plus win teams, Houston and Atlanta, in the NL playoffs. San Diego, which went 98-64, now becomes the first club ever to play three 100-game winners in the postseason.

Yeltsin seeks reelection while health fluctuates

MOSCOW — Despite a lingering cold, Boris Yeltsin returned to the Kremlin for a second day Thursday, and doctors said his health was satisfactory.

The 67-year-old Russian president came down with a respiratory infection that forced him to cut short a trip to Central Asia earlier in the week. Doctors ordered him to stay home, in bed, to recuperate.

But Yeltsin showed up at the Kremlin on Thursday and met with the latest judge appointed to the Constitutional Court, which opened hearings into whether Yeltsin could legally seek a third term in office despite a two-year constitutional limit. He and Judge Anatoly Sliva, who was named to the court this week, did not discuss the hearings, the Interfax news agency said.

Yeltsin's press spokesman Dmitry Yakushkin quoted doctors as saying the president's health was "satisfactory," although he "still has signs of a cold," Interfax said.

Because of Yeltsin's history of health problems, including 1996 heart bypass surgery, whenever he falls ill, speculation arises over whether he is fit to govern. Still, he insists he plans to serve out the remaining two years of his term.

Third man confesses, Edwards trial thickens

BATON ROUGE, La. — Another man pleaded guilty today and agreed to cooperate in the investigation of former Gov. Edwin Edwards, and an FBI agent testified Edwards was ready to pay a purported electronics expert a half-million dollars to find out what evidence the government had against him.

Dempsey Whitfield Jr., a retired state highway department engineer, pleaded guilty to failing to report an illegal conspiracy involving Edwards and his son Stephen to illegally tap FBI agents' phones. He became the third man in 10 days to agree to testify for the government in the case against Edwards.

The previous pleas were made by San Francisco 49ers owner Eddie DeBartolo and Lake Charles casino consultant Richard Shetler in return for their cooperation in the Edwards investigation. Edwards is one of the targets in a wide-ranging federal investigation that has gone on for about two years. The case most recently has focused on the awarding of riverboat casino licenses during Edwards' last term as governor and after he left office. The alleged wiretap conspiracy grew out of that investigation. FBI agent DeWayne Horner appeared in federal court in connection with White's plea.

Reading from a report signed by White, Horner said White helped Edwards set up meetings with a man known only as "the cooperating witness" who was from Kiln, Miss.

Educational board tests required for educators

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Board of Education announced a report of initiatives concerning teacher candidates, after 59 percent of them failed the first-ever teacher test in April.

Scores on the test improved only slightly when 47 percent failed a similar version of the test given in July. Results of the third round of the exam, given Oct. 3, will not be available for several weeks, according to an Oct. 13 article by Robin Estrin of the Associated Press.

At the University, according to Masha Rudman, director of the elementary education program, 86 percent of elementary education majors passed the test, and 78 percent of early education majors passed.

The report, which was prompted by acting governer Cellucci's insistence, gives more than 20 recommendations to improve the quality of Massachusetts educators.

According to a press release from Cellucci, highlights of the plan include measures to:

–Eliminate certification of schools of education that fail to meet an 80 percent pass rate in two successive years and demand that these schools meet a 90 percent pass rate by August 1, 2001;

–Urge colleges and universities to raise admission requirements for their teacher education programs by requiring reading, writing and subject matter exams;

–Implement and promote Tomorrow's Teachers, a scholarship program for the most gifted high school students who make a four-year commitment to teach in a Massachusetts public school;

–Offer free tuition for qualified undergraduates who decide to become teachers;

–Encourage professionals with private-sector experience to become teachers by developing the Pathways to Teaching Program and create a college-to-school track for professors who wish to teach in elementary or secondary schools; and –Appoint a joint board consisting of members of the Board of Education, the board of Higher Education, and two at- large members to implement Cellucci's education plan and monitor the state's schools of education, ensuring they meet high standards.

In the Associated Press article, it said only Harvard University and Wellesly College had passing rates of at least 80 percent.

Rudman said once the school of education gets more information about the test, it should be easier to develop study guides and incorporate more test–related information into the curriculum.

"The test didn't test what the school [of education], offered," she said. "[it tests] what you learn before you get to the school of education."

"The whole campus needs some work incorporating more writing into programs," Rudman said.

Rudman also said an example of what is on the test is summarizing passages.

"They mean, say what six main points are and synthesize it in your own words." When you know how to choose what the six most important points are, you'll do better," she said.

Now that the program has some knowledge of what the test is comprised of, said Rudman, they have begun to make some small changes.

"We didn't know music was on the test. Now we are incorporating music into our creative arts class," she said.

Controversy over the teacher certification test falls at the heels of the November gubernatorial election. Cellucci's opponent in the race, Attorney General of Massachusetts Scott Harshbarger, contests that the acting governor is using the testing as an election–time "gimmick."

A spokesperson for the Harshbarger campaign, John Lamontagne, said, "He [Cellucci] said in an April debate if a current teacher failed the test a second time he or she would be removed."

"Paul Cellucci in the past has never showed any interest in this, other than during the election. In 1995 he opposed certifying teachers and basically opposed setting a standard for teachers. While it's nice election year rhetoric from Cellucci, that's all it is," Lamontagne said.

Harshbarger, according to Lamontagne, favors a test for first–time teachers, and only one for current teachers, when it is used as part of an overall review.

BankBoston protesting invitation loss

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

BankBoston was not invited back to the University of Massachusetts during registration week this year to advertise their accounts for students.

BankBoston has provided service to the greater western Massachusetts area and UMass for over a decade.

It has been a tradition, during the start of each semester, for the University to invite BankBoston on campus for the purpose of providing service to the students. For the first time, however, BankBoston was not allowed by the University to set up a booth on the Campus Center Concourse during registration week.

BankBoston representative Dick Stevens felt that the University had provided him with no explanation for their actions. In a way, he felt the bank's relationship with the students was violated.

"I feel we've been the bank of choice for many students over a decade," Stevens said. "It would have been a better convenience for new students to be able to open an account with a bank that has available ATM's on campus."

Stevens said since the spring of 1997, banks were asked to put together a package of banking services that could be offered to faculty, staff members, and students that work for the University.

One of the requirements is that the bank would have to give the faculty a fee–free account for five years as a part of the package.

BankBoston offers a two–year fee–free account option to its other customers and Stevens felt meeting the University's requirement of a five–year fee–free option would not be fair to the other customers.

"We wanted to be consistent with the packages that we offered other employee groups," Stevens said. "We decided not to submit the package to the University."

According to Stevens, the University said if a bank doesn't participate in a faculty and staff program, then they wouldn't be allowed on campus to solicit accounts from the general student body.

Stevens didn't feel that it was appropriate to limit the banking options of the general student body because a bank wouldn't participate in a faculty program.

"The University was basically using the ability to solicit to the student body to get a better banking package for the employees," Stevens said. "I hope that we can work the issue out so that we might be able to return to campus next semester."

Associate Treasurer for Financial Services Phil Marquis, has been recently meeting with Stevens to discuss the issue. Marquis would not comment on the progress of the meetings, but did state that some conclusive result would soon be reached.

Accomplice to murder testifies for 25–to–life

BRENTWOOD, N.H. (AP) — A Massachusetts man who said he heard a Salem teen–ager being killed testified Thursday that his friend removed the victim's clothing and tried to sexually assault her corpse.

James Grant, 20, of Fitchburg, Mass., said he heard Kimberly Farrah, 18, scream the night she and Leeann Millius, 17, were killed in a Salem park last September.

Eric Jeleniewski, 20, of Lunenburg, Mass., is charged with first-degree murder and faces life in prison with no chance of parole if convicted.

Grant, the state's star witness, pleaded guilty in July to killing Millius and agreed to testify against Jeleniewski in exchange for a 25-year-to-life sentence.

"It was like a death scream," Grant said during the first day of testimony in Jeleniewski's trial. "I knew someone was getting hurt. From what Eric had said earlier, I knew what it was." Grant's plea bargain also calls for him to testify against a third suspect, Christopher Doucette, 19, also of Lunenburg. Doucette will go on trial in March for Millius' death.

Vigil proves success, students mourn death

Candles illuminated the orange leaves of a tree on the Amherst Common last night at a vigil to remember a gay college student who died after being beaten last week.

"It's very welcoming. They welcome all orientations," said a University of Massachusetts sophomore attending the vigil.

The Stonewall Center, Everywoman's Center, University of Massachusetts Pride Alliance and the Men's Resource Center sponsored the vigil in honor of Matthew Shepard, 21, A University of Wyoming student who died Monday after several days in a coma.

Shepard was discovered last Wednesday tied to a post outside Laramie, Wyoming. His skull had been crushed so badly doctors could not operate.

"At first I was numb about it. Now I'm just in a state of sadness. I'm so shut down," said Beth Bellavance–Grace, holding an arch of rainbow colored candle holders. "It's an example of how much extreme hate there is in the world."

There was a large crowd that clustered around the tree holding candles and listening to various speakers.

State Representative Ellen Story spoke to the crowd about respect.

"This was a whole different level of violence," she said. "It brings us all up short and makes us realize we must try even harder than we've been trying to insist, while you don't have to love everybody else you have to respect everyone."

UMass Police Chief John Luippold said he had several feelings about the beating.

"Two things have stayed with me. One is sorrow. As a parent, I cannot imagine the great loss for Matthew's family," he said to the crowd whose faces were awash with candlelight. "That leaves me with anger."

"We come here tonight with profound sadness," said Paul Vasconcellos, assistant dean of students.

Several other representatives from UMass spoke to the crowd including Bailey Jackson, dean of the school of education, Oscar Jones a residence director and other professors and staff members.

Some listeners said the vigil was a comforting experience.

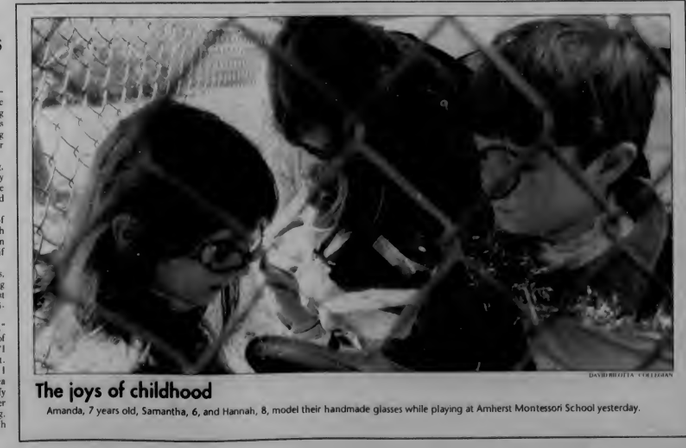
"I think it's unifying," said Dana Baker a UMass student.

"There is a] sense of community, hope and humanity. Positive aspects of people."

"I think its wonderful so many people showed up," said Johanna Friedle, who said she came to be an ally.

"Usually I avoid stuff like this, but I felt this was important. It's pretty somber," said Felice Yenkel.

Many of the participants said the news of Shepard's beating was a shock.



"I can't believe stuff like this still goes on," said Friedle. "I think everybody here is shocked about the whole incident."

The event featured several songs in addition to the speakers. Nice Shoes, a feminist a capella group from Mount Holyoke performed, as well as Sandy Mandel and Pat Humphries from the Everywoman's Center and singer songwriter Tom Nielson.

The vigil closed with the group joining together to sing.

The memorial on the Common came three days after the two men arrested for the beating of Shepard, Russell Arthur Henderson, 21, and Aaron James Mckinney, 22, were charged with murder. The charge came when Shepard died in Fort Collins, Colo. hospital Monday.

The men face charges of first degree murder, aggravated robbery and kidnapping with intent to inflict bodily harm.

Will kids confirm hype of Furby doll?

By Rachel Beck
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Furby, a gremlin-like interactive plaything, is considered "the hot toy" for Christmas. But WHO, exactly, decided so?

Not the kids.

Publicity campaigns artfully waged by grown-ups play a large role in determining what's the must-have toy of the season. "The hot toy is just another term for hyped toy," said Marianne Szymanski, president of Toy Tips, a Marquette University-based center that does toy research with children. "Parents are buying these toys because someone is telling them to buy it, not because they think it's the best products for their kids."

Tina Morales, a mother of two from New York, said: "I hate to admit it, but I do keep my ears open for the popular Christmas toys. So do my friends, and then we compare what we got the kids for Christmas."

Toymakers don't just use paid advertising anymore, but also employ intense publicity campaigns. And today's biggest publicity coup is a spot on one of the morning TV shows or evening news broadcasts. Toymakers know even a brief mention can ignite sales. "The Rosie O'Donnell Show," for one, gets a lot of requests from toymakers to appear on the show. Two years ago, Tickle Me Elmo began to sell out of stores after its Oct. appearance on the program and a Nov. spot on the No. 1 morning show, NBC's "Today."

Furby found success in a similar way. In Sept., Furby got a ringing endorsement from Wired magazine, which picked the creature as the top toy for Christmas based on its own survey of items shown at Toy Fair, the no-kids-allowed trade show held in New York every February.

The 5-inch furry toy speaks its own "furbish" language and sells for an average $30.

For its official launch on Oct. 2, Furby appeared on national morning TV shows, and its manufacturer, Tiger Electronics, held a media event at FAO Schwarz that attracted everyone from CNN to Entertainment Weekly magazine.

Within days, media outlets nationwide were touting Furby as the "it" toy for Christmas. Few, however, mentioned that Furby was available only at a few stores at the time.

Thanks to the hype, Furby already is the best-selling toy at FAO stores and in its catalog.

"Our job is to make sure that people know the products are out there," said Marc Rosenberg, a spokesman for Tiger, a division of Hasbro. "But in the end, you can't fool kids, and kids who have seen Furby absolutely love it."

Toymakers also rely heavily on toy testing or hire toy "experts" to spread the word about their products. They know that toy tests, many of which are sponsored by magazines or local media outlets, get great publicity.

But many of these tests don't use children for their research and require manufacturers to pay entry fees.

"Most of the toy tests are created in false environments. They aren't real tests," said Chris Byrne, editor of Playthings MarketWatch, a toy trade publication. "Most look at toys that have been submitted by a publicist. They don't go out and look at what is on store shelves. They don't even shop with kids."

Steveanne Auerbach, who is known as Dr. Toy and is a popular authority on toys, said in the Sept. issue of Playthings magazine, a trade publication, that she doesn't use children to test toys "because kids love everything...I know when I look at a toy whether or not it is something that will really benefit a kid."

As for the toy "experts," many are paid by manufacturers or retailers to promote certain toys.

Toy Tips founder Szymanski said Internet toy retailer eToys last year offered her a commission for the sale of any toy that she recommended on the Toy Tips Web site. Phil Polishook, eToys' vice president of marketing, said the company never offered her commissions.

In the end, of course, parents don't have to buy into the hype. But every year, many of them resort to guerrilla-shopping tactics to get their hands on the hot toys, sometimes acting just like children, with lots of pushing and shoving.

Inmate wins appeasment for torment

By Alexis Chiu
Associated Press

BOSTON — A federal jury Thursday awarded $37,500 to an inmate who said a man he shot in the head in 1991 became a prison guard and tormented him behind bars.

Zeferino DePina, 24, claimed that prison officials did nothing while the guard, Filipe Monteiro, harassed and beat him at the maximum-security state prison at Walpole.

The jury ordered prison Superintendent Ronald Duval to pay the biggest share, $25,000. The director of the prison's disciplinary unit was ordered to pay $5,000. The jury found that the two men were "deliberately, recklessly or callously indifferent" to DePina's safety.

Monteiro was ordered to pay $5,000. Another guard must pay $2,500.

Prison officials said they will appeal. They had argued that the inmate was to blame.

"The victim here was consistently Monteiro, the aggressor was DePina every time," said Christopher Holliday, a Correction Department lawyer.

DePina claimed Monteiro flipped his cell lights on and off at night and kicked his door to keep him awake. He also said he was attacked twice, once in the shower, where Monteiro and another guard allegedly punched him in the head and repeatedly threatened to kill him.

Seven years ago, DePina shot Monteiro in the head on a street in Boston's Roxbury section. DePina claimed Monteiro and a group of friends had bullied him and tried to take his motorcycle.

DePina pleaded guilty to assault and was sentenced in 1992 to four to 12 years at Walpole.

Monteiro began working for the Correction Department four months after DePina was sent away. A month later, Monteiro was assigned to Walpole.

DePina claimed Monteiro harassed him until the guard was transferred to another prison in 1996.

DePina said he first encountered his victim in the mess hall. He said Monteiro later confronted him and asked, "Why did you have to shoot me?"

The inmate said he replied: "It's over and done with. You go your way and I'll go mine - I don't want any problems."

Shooter under psychological review

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A government psychiatrist will examine the suspect in the fatal ambush of two Capitol police guards to see if he is mentally fit to stand trial, lawyers on both sides of the case agreed today.

Russell E. Weston Jr. sat in a wheelchair a few yards from the front row of courtroom seats where the widows of officers Jacob J. Chestnut and John Gibson sat side by side. It was the first time the women had seen Weston, who was arrested shortly after the July 24 shooting spree inside a crowded Capitol hallway.

Mrs. Chestnut dabbed at her eyes with a handkerchief and leaned against Mrs. Gibson's shoulder during the brief hearing in federal court. The two women were scheduled to attend a ceremony to add their husbands' names to a Washington memorial to fallen law enforcement officers later today.

The families of both officers and their Capitol Police escorts declined comment after the hearing, which formally begins the process of testing whether Weston, a diagnosed paranoid schizophrenic, can understand and participate in a trial.

Weston's lawyers would not discuss his mental state outside court today, but have acknowledged that the issue will be key to the case.

"We'll know more," after the doctor's review, defense lawyer Barry Boss said.

Weston was badly injured in the exchange of gunfire with officers, and was hospitalized under heavy guard until last weekend. He is now jailed in a treatment center in Washington. Weston's plea to federal murder charges will await the outcome of the psychiatric review by the top federal prison psychiatrist. The observations of neighbors and family and Weston's own writings indicate he believed the federal government was watching him through a neighbor's satellite dish. He once reportedly harangued a CIA guard with oddball stories that he and President Clinton were clones.

Insanity as a legal definition is different from the medical diagnosis of mental illness and is defined by someone's ability to separate right from wrong.

To be judged criminally insane under federal law, a person must prove that at the time of the crime, he or she "as a result of a severe mental disease or defect was unable to appreciate the nature and quality or the wrongfulness of his acts." The law goes on to say that the simple fact of being mentally ill is not a sufficient defense.

Plane insulation faulty

By Lawrence L. Knutson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The plastic coating on airplane insulation can help spread fires and should be replaced worldwide, the Federal Aviation Administration said Thursday.

The air safety agency is speeding up tests to set higher fire safety standards for aircraft insulating material and will issue new rules after six months. In the meantime, it is urging manufacturers to go ahead and install fire-retardant material "at the earliest possible maintenance interval."

The Boeing Co., the largest U.S. aircraft manufacturer, said it will cooperate fully.

The process will require production line changes and major refitting of existing aircraft. The Air Transport Association, which represents 28 U.S. airlines and air transport companies, requested early technical discussions with the FAA on exactly what is involved.

Replacing insulation is certain to be costly. It would require not only lengthy grounding of an aircraft but also removal of much of its interior paneling so the aircraft's aluminum skin and ribs are exposed. Typically, such extensive work is done only during major aircraft overhauls, which normally is scheduled once every five years.

Transport association President Carol Hallett underscored FAA Administrator Jane Garvey's contention that the record of aircraft fires involving insulation "does not indicate a widespread or immediate safety threat."

Likewise, Ron Hinderberger, Boeing's director of air safety, said: "We have not had any fatality or even any injury associated with insulation blanket fires."

The FAA investigation, under way for months, has focused on certain forms of Mylar coating such as that used on insulation blankets installed aboard Swissair Flight 111, which crashed off Nova Scotia last month and killed all 229 people aboard.

Although the air crew reported smoke in the cockpit before the MD-11 went down in the Atlantic, insulation material recovered at the crash site showed no evidence of burn or heat damage, the FAA said.

Swissair pledged to implement any action recommended by the FAA on insulation material.

"Reports in the U.S. media have suggested that the metalized Mylar insulation material used on the aircraft may have contributed to the accident because it was not sufficiently heat-resistant," a Swissair statement said. "However, the Canadian authorities investigating the accident have found no evidence to date linking Mylar with the loss of the flight."

Boeing's Hinderberger said insulating material installed on Boeing jetliners exceeds existing FAA standards.

"What the FAA sets in front of us - and which we are fully supportive of - is an even higher standard," Hinderberger told reporters.

"We're going to work as fast as we can to bring production up to new standards. ... I can guarantee it will be fast," accomplished within six months, he said.

Peggy Gilligan, the FAA's deputy associate administrator for regulation, said the agency is compressing its fire-testing schedule from a year to six months. She said the number of aircraft involved and the cost of replacing existing insulation won't be known until the regulations are issued.

Cult members gone, families fear suicide

By Robin McDowell
Associated Press

DENVER — The leader of a doomsday cult who predicted the destruction of Denver last weekend has vanished along with about 50 of his followers, raising fears they are bent on mass suicide. Followers of Monte Kim Miller's group, Concerned Christians, have sold their belongings and abandoned their homes. Cult watchers believe the group may be headed to Jerusalem because of Miller's belief he would die there in Dec. 1999 and be resurrected three days later.

Miller founded Concerned Christians in the early 1980's, preaching against the evils of cults and New Age movements. Hal Mansfield, director of the Fort Collins-based Religious Movement Resource Center, which has been monitoring the Denver-based Concerned Christians for at least two years, said Miller might have started the movement as a financial scam. But critics said the group has transformed itself into an apocalyptic personality cult.

Debate and tackle

Stacy Shackford

The Mullins Center has been the stage for many University of Massachusetts basketball games and sporting events. Wednesday night it also hosted the 1998 Massachusetts Gubernatorial Debate, which was actually very similar to a sporting event.

The candidates paraded past a "forest" of brightly colored signs to the accompaniment of the West Springfield High School marching band. Once inside, it did not take them long to spar off.

Chancellor David K. Scott appropriately opened the event by saying, "As the ancient Romans would have said, 'Let the debate begin.'" Members of the audience acted like Romans eager for a fight, or like school children egging on a bully in the school yard. The audience, made up largely of Democratic and Republican factions and campaign supporters, was even seated by "team." They cheered, booed, and hissed as their players took blows at each other. Neither Paul Celluci nor Scott Harshbarger played by the rules. They were blindly throwing verbal punches, dodging questions, and repeating the same phrases over and over again.

"Raising taxes is in your blood, Scott!"

"You're distorting the truth, Paul!"

"I'm already doing it, Scott."

"Paul, you have no shame."

At one point, one candidate accused the other of making personal attacks. They were very personal, using each others first names in an intimate battle, like two brothers bickering. I almost expected them to stick out their tongues and retort with, "I'm rubber, you're glue; whatever you say bounces off me and sticks to you."

How ironic that the focus of the debate was education and the candidates were acting like they were in the third grade. The moderator was like a frustrated school teacher trying to keep the candidates in line. "Time's up now gentlemen. Gentlemen? Time!"

Rachel Sherman, a senior marketing major whom I spoke with after the debate, was as disgusted as I was about the immaturity of the candidates and the audience. "I was always taught to wait your turn and don't talk when others are speaking. I was so disgusted with the lack of civility and respect, not only of the candidates, but also among the supporters and audience members."

She also added, "They were both talking about education, but the under-representation of students was a little suspect."

Sherman and I were two of the few lucky students allowed to attend the event. Students were in such short supply, in fact, that they became conspicuous members of the audience. People eyed me strangely as I sat down, and the young boy sitting behind me asked his mother, "Mom, why aren't they letting college students come?"

She replied, "Well, honey, there are too many college students and it would be too hard to control."

"Does that mean when I'm in college they won't let me in?"

Bright boy. He asked a very good question. Why weren't college students allowed? It's not as if we would have wrecked havoc and chaos upon the debate. Apparently they didn't need us for that.

It was an insult to students that the debate was held on a college campus, yet students were not allowed to attend. At the very least, Student Government Association members should have been allowed to attend. In fact, they were promised tickets and didn't find out until Wednesday morning that they would not be able to attend. Instead, young children and campaign supporters were booing and hissing and being generally embarrassing.

Why did they bother holding it at UMass anyway? It was simply a token gesture to the Western Massachusetts voting community saying, yes, we care about what you think, even though we've been shafting you all these years. Perhaps the candidates wanted to prove their dedication to education. Then why was the only mention of the University Harshbarger's accusation that Cellucci vetoed asbestos removal?

One of the Young Republicans I spoke with after the debate had a startling insight. He suggested that the reason the audience was kept so small and tickets were limited was the desire to control the crowd and ensure that the percentage of supporters for each candidate was equal. Although the number of Celluci and Harshbarger supporters was pretty much even, it didn't matter much when it came down to the loud hollers and booing of the very uncontrolled, yet studentless, crowd. In fact, the most controlled members of the audience were the few students and University community members.

I was embarrassed at how quickly the debate degenerated. I cringed each time the moderator tried unsuccessfully to break up petty bickering. I was offended by the insincere sugar-sweet closing remarks of both candidates. How quaint that Harshbarger ended the debate by reflecting on the background of core values instilled in him from his hard working, middle class parents. How nice of Celluci to bring up (for the first time) his commitment to women's rights and to stopping domestic violence. It almost made me want to vote for him. Actually, it almost caused me to lose my faith in the political system entirely. As an exasperated Sherman pointed out, she doesn't even feel like going home to vote now.

I attended the event in hopes of witnessing a sophisticated debate, not a petty grade school fight – we have the SGA for that.

All you can eat?

Vamsee Juluri

Who are you and what are you doing right now? Allow me to lay some heavy questions into the calm repose of your Collegian moment. Perhaps you're struggling with the center page as you try to reach your lunch in the Hatch or Earth Foods. Perhaps you're somewhere else. But whoever you are and whatever you are doing, I'm sure of one thing. You are living, breathing, and reading because of the energy from the food you have eaten. Maybe you're even eating right now, and are enjoying the feeling of rejuvenation after a particularly hungry stretch.

Mundane as this observation may sound, it is an important way to appreciate the role of food in our position along the food chain. Food is important to identify. Therefore, I'm interested in the role of food in our lives as something that we can understand through common sense. And also by appreciating common sensory experience, hunger, as well as relief from hunger.

But to do so requires knowledge and a sense of right and wrong.

Today is World Food Day. It's a good occasion to begin reflecting on these issues, but we will need to do a lot more. After all, every day is a food day in the sense that we have to eat regularly. But what we seldom realize is that for centuries, food (its production and consumption) was central to the common sense of most people in the world. In our modern, affluent society, it's merely one among many issues. We may think that we don't need to worry about food because we never hear of famine and starvation anywhere but in the third world. But there is a direct connection between the worlds of hunger and the worlds of abundance that is actually not hard to imagine once we begin to try. For starters, we, in the wealthy countries, must understand that while food is something that we only occasionally think about, for most of the five billion people on this earth, it is an immediate and overwhelming reality.

So why should this be an issue on our campus where other issues, frivolous and serious, often dominate? Because everyone here eats too, and everyone who eats must think about how our society manages its relations between the producers and consumers of food, and how it provides cultural meanings to food. We must also consider the effects of this relationship are being felt right now in our modern and oh-so-postmodern websurfin' world are very insane. Step for a moment and list the ways in which we treat food in our culture. Food is seen primarily as entertainment, as stuff that gives our jaws something to do while we sit and watch TV. Or it's an occasion to do something more important, like conduct business, pursue a relationship, or chase down alcohol (to be ignominiously chased up shortly thereafter, of course).

On a slightly refreshing note, we also think of food as a health concern, and worry about getting too many calories and not enough nutrients. We worry about our sugar-induced dental bills. We worry about what detergent to use to get food stains off dishes and laundry. In short, we have some serious consumer blues about food, though our society has plenty of it.

The problem is that we have few cultural resources, from our media and our education, to appreciate the urgency of food as something that is central to our lives, and to the lives of everyone in this world. Our parents may tell us to thank God for our food and not to waste it because people are starving elsewhere. It's a good sentiment, but not enough to combat our topsy-turvy media culture which highlights food only in terms of health and beauty problems. As long as we continue to see food as a problem for us with its fatty, sugary excesses, we can barely understand our relationship to the rest of the world, for whom we see food as a problem because of famines and other natural disasters.

If the messages we get about food in our society are ridiculous, the ideas we have about food and hunger elsewhere are criminally untrue. We are told, by experts and media, that the main reason for hunger in the world is that there are too many people (because disease and war don't exterminate like they used to). We are told that people are hungry because they are either too lazy or stupid to get a job. We haven't been told, however, that most people who are hungry in the world are actually people who grow the food that you and I eat. We haven't been told that tons of grain are dumped in the sea to keep prices up while people are starving. We haven't been told that a large portion of the world's population still lies in agricultural areas and is struggling to survive. We haven't been told that most of the urban poor who live in third world cities are people displaced from agriculture at some point or another.

We need to reexamine our relationship to food because it is through food that we are related, and deeply complicit, in the conditions that the majority of the world's struggling, starving people live with. They aren't just doing their job, they are being brutally and systematically exploited. For centuries, most people on the earth were producers and consumers of their own food. For the first time, and on a gigantic scale, we find the producers of food in starvation and the consumers of food fretting about gaining weight.

Recognizing this fact would be the first step in fighting the conquest of our imagination by our candy-stricken consumer culture. Let us pay a little less attention to the spectres on TV and a little more attention to the vegetables on our plate. That piece of broccoli on your fork is telling you a story too. About a poor, tired, broken-backed man who bloodied his knuckles getting it off the ground in some faraway place. About his inability to afford to eat the things he has grown. About his loss of home and his forced exile as migrant labor in someone's giant farm. About his hunger.

Letters to the Editor

Outrage over Shepherd death

Two rednecks from Wyoming, "the Equality State," observed National Coming Out Day by savagely beating, torturing and murdering a small, gentle, gay, male college student. Observe the irony that the victimization of Mr. Shepard was singled out for this brutal, savage attack and execution because of his gay identity – because he had the courage to come out and live his life as an openly gay man.

"Let's teach our young people how such tragedies today are analogous to the lynchings of days past, and just as abominable."

We are all victimized by this incident. Hate crimes against gay and lesbians are intended to keep us down and powerless, to keep us quiet and invisible, to tell us that we will be attacked if we try to assert our right to live our lives openly and truthfully. Fear is the weapon being branded against us. We are made to fear the process of coming out. We are made to fear the notion of living our lives as openly gay people. How sad that on National Coming Out Day, a day when we reach out to our fearful gay brothers and sisters and encourage them to face down their fears, we should be reminded so shockingly of the justification for those fears.

I hope we as a community will not take this affront quietly. I hope that we will have the courage to declare loudly that this treatment is intolerable, that we will not be pushed into the closet, that we will not be intimidated into giving up our civil rights, and that we will not capitulate to violence and fear.

I hope that we will inspire our closeted and fearful brethren to have courage that Matthew Shepard had, to stand up to the fear and live openly as gay people. I hope that we will unite to assert our rightful place in society, to claim the benefits and privileges that heterosexual society takes for granted but resists giving us.

I hope that college campuses and gay communities across the country will memorialize Matthew Shepard by holding vigils, by rallying for the right for all of us to live openly as gay people, free of harassment.

I, for one, have had enough. If others of you share this sentiment, let's make it known. Let's write to our Congressmen and demand passage of the Hate Crimes Prevention Act. Let's organize student rallies on our campuses. Let's teach our young people how such tragedies today are analogous to the lynchings of days past, and just as abominable.

But please, let's each do something. Let It be known that hatred will no longer be tolerated. This loss will not go unremembered; it must not go unpunished. We cannot allow it to be swept under the rug. We cannot just suffer in silence any longer. Otherwise, a little piece of each of us died with Matthew Shepard.

Spying on the spies

Elsa Allen

This story begins over three years ago. I feel that it is time that I confront the insecurities that force me to constantly glance over my shoulders, speak more quietly into the call boxes and hide behind the newspaper on the bus. Perhaps I am indeed going crazy, this is for you to judge.

My story begins in Southwest in the fall of 1995. Like any other freshmen, my friends and I were naturally curious about the people that were living in such close proximity to us. We made every effort to become friends with those who had been placed in the rooms around us, and for the most part we all became friends, and remain so to this day.

There were, however, a handful of people that did not respond to our attempts at friendship, and appeared to shy away from any direct contact with the group that we had formed. We began to observe these people, and we made a shocking and terrifying discovery. They were observing us.

Although they avoided any conversation with us, turned their heads when the slight possibility of eye contact existed and whispered to each other when they saw us in the elevators, it became clear to us at the time that they were tracking our activities. We began to call them Spytech.

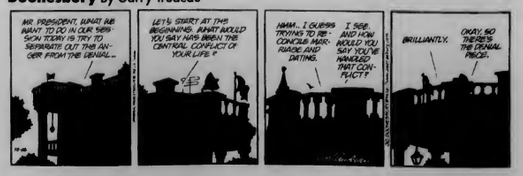
They acted as though they were playing a game, one that would have required the toys sold under the Spytech line. You know, the plastic walkie–talkies, the fake infrared goggles and other assorted spy paraphernalia. When we entered the hallway, their doors would open a crack and we would catch a glimpse of the beady eyes before they slammed shut once more. They would be casually reclining on the floor as we stepped out of the elevator, casting a sideways glance as they (I can only imagine) made a mental note of the time and date that we arrived.

But we never questioned their actions. After all, we thought, we were just being paranoid. They were harmless. We moved out in the spring, assuming that we would never see them again.

But, we were wrong. Spytech continued to haunt us on a regular basis during our sophomore and junior years. They would be spotted in the dining halls across campus, in lectures, in downtown Amherst and at the supermarket. When I spotted one of them I was no longer surprised or afraid. In fact, I expected to see them pop out of planters or from behind trees, binoculars pressed tightly against their faces, as though we were a Mafia family being tracked by the FBI.

I soon came to the disappointing realization that these people were not in fact tracking us at all. I know it may seem shocking to you, but my life is by no means exciting enough to warrant the effort that I imagined Spytech expended in cataloging my daily activities. Yes, it was all in my mind.

But this is not the point that I intended to make to you today. There is something much more pertinent within my Spytech story than the simple fact that I have just given proof to many about speculations that I may be clinically insane. My point is that everybody on campus has their own version of Spytech.



These are the people that you simply see everywhere, from semester to semester. You don't know them, you don't know their names or where they live and they don't know you. Eventually it gets to the point where you debate whether or not you should smile and nod as you pass each other for the umpteenth time during the day. Maybe you consider a verbal greeting, perhaps a "Wassup?" or a simple "Yo!" But inevitably your shy, secluded alter ego gets the better of you, and you simply continue the anonymous relationship that you have formed with this person.

I still see Spytech on a regular basis, and I wonder if they really know who I am anymore. Perhaps my friends and I were a fleeting curiosity, created out of dorm boredom. Perhaps we were obnoxious and loud, as is the unfortunate case with many large groups of freshmen girls, and many other people observed us as well, all of them muttering under their breath as we trooped into the DC in a flurry of screams and giggles.

The story ends there, with little point or conclusion. I still wonder about Spytech, trying to deduce where their curiosity may have stemmed from. I can still hear the computers whizzing from behind their closed doors, feel their stares boring into the back of my neck, and I still expect them to appear at any moment. So, if you see a periscope emerge from the center of the campus pond as I walk by, or a mysterious figure, clad in black peer from behind a shrub, let me know, offer me the comfort that maybe this isn't all in my head.

Popsters Saint Etienne bring the sunshine in

COURTESY HAMISH BROWN

Saint Etienne makes the world a happier place with their newest release.

By Matthew Nixon
Collegian Correspondent

GOOD HUMOR
Saint Etienne
Sub-Pop

I love this band. I had missed them, even though they might have broken up. Their light-hearted cover of Neil Young's "Only Love Can Break Your Heart" caught my attention in 1990 and has held it ever since. Their last album, Tiger Bay, came out in 1994. The years since have seen a few B–side compilations and a solo album from Sarah Cracknell. Good Humor is a triumphant return.

The band Saint Etienne is composed of the extremely creative musical threesome of Bob Stanley, Pete Wiggs and Cracknell. Their sound has always had a retro feel to it — reminiscent of a era, somewhat like the Sixties or Seventies. Saint Etienne's hiatus lead other bands to fill the void their absence created. Japan's Pizzicato Five and Sweden's The Cardigans were worthy substitutes.

On past releases, the band mixed up their retro sound with the beats and tricks of Nineties dance records. Good Humor is a return to sounds reminiscent of sunny days in the past that combines the varied elements of lounge, film music and an odd Beatles reference to create a refreshingly upbeat album. Generation X author Douglas Coupland writes in the liner notes that Saint Etienne creates "a world in which all women wear pearls and are able to sing in key–one where the men drive sports cars and never stumble."

The music is top notch. Wiggs and Stanley discard the cute snippets and samples found between tracks on previous albums and focus on creating intricate melodies that combine vibraphones and trumpets into an eloquent mix. The two know exactly how to add touches, like the twinkle of a triangle, to create pop perfection. Cracknell's breathy vocal style is the icing on the cake. "Goodnight Jack" is stunning and possibly sums up what Saint Etienne is all about. A flute, the kind usually heard in theme tunes to vintage cop shows, floats over a bass line and a wonderful drum sound.

Every song is a story set to music. "Sylive" finds a girl telling her younger sister that she has no chance with the boy of her dreams. From a love song simply entitled "Postman," one lyric is particularly noteworthy: "Do I really deserve this/silhouettes at the window?" Pop genius. A–

Oprah's struggle to bring Beloved to the big screen ends in triumph

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

When you've produced the highest rated talk show in television history, received seven Emmy awards, been named one of the hundred most influential people of the twentieth century, and awarded a Lifetime Achievement trophy, what do you do for an encore?

That was the challenge facing Oprah Winfrey. But as her labor of love and latest film, Beloved, opens today, she's proved she's up to any task.

The film, based on the Pulitzer Prize–winning novel by author Toni Morrison, is actually only Winfrey's second feature film. Her last film was made over a decade ago and had similar themes. Steven Spielberg's The Color Purple provided her with an auspicious debut, much respect, and an Academy Award nomination.

Beloved, though, proved to be a much harder and more involving chore. The book was published a year after Purple's release, in 1987. Readers, including Winfrey, were immediately smitten. The story of a runaway slave fighting to keep her family from the horrors of her former life haunted the public and critics alike. After much hesitation by Morrison, Winfrey finally was able to buy the film rights that very same year, but it nearly a decade would pass until the movie went into production.

Part of the problem had to do with how to translate such a dense, non–linear novel into cinematic terms. Winfrey's first choice as a director was Jodie Foster, who had written a thesis on the novel while attending Yale. Foster politely refused, simply saying the book was not fit for the screen.

Winfrey, like Sethe, the character she plays in the film, didn't back down. With her production company Harpo (Oprah spelled backwards), the determined talk show host continued to search for the perfect director and a screenplay that would capture the heart of the novel. There was another obstacle she first faced, however — getting to the heart of Sethe. Directors had trouble believing that the outspoken, emotional Winfrey would fit the mold of the unspoken, stoic Sethe. Filmmakers from Carl Franklin (One True Thing) to Peter Weir (The Truman Show) expressed interest in the project, but didn't see Oprah in the lead role.

As usual, she proved them wrong, and convinced at least one director that she was the only one who could play the part. Jonathan Demme's last picture was the AIDS drama Philadelphia, and he had been looking for another task to work on.

Gallo's Buffalo '66 is artsy but hollow

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

BUFFALO '66
Directed by Vincent Gallo with Vincent Gallo, Christina Ricci, Angelica Huston
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

With his directorial debut, actor Vincent Gallo manages to pull off some interesting tricks, but ends up crafting a film with little substance, most of its best moments not offering much an experienced filmgoer has not seen before.

The narrative concerns an abrasive ex–con named Billy Brown (Gallo), just released from prison, Billy goes off to visit his parents...and find a bathroom the ever asks to be readmitted to the jail he was just released from to use once). While calling home to let his parents know he is coming, his mother demands that Billy bring his wife (apparently Billy told a few lies while he was in prison). Billy ends up kidnapping a busty blonde tap dance student with too much eye makeup named Layla (Christina Ricci), demanding that she play the part of his wife. Layla ends up being a more than willing hostage.

Upon meeting Billy's parents, we get some kind of understanding of why Billy is the way he is. His mother (Angelica Huston) is a rabid football fan–photos of Jack Kemp and O.J. Simpson outnumber photos of Billy as a child. It is also apparent that Mrs. Brown regrets giving birth to Billy because it made her miss the game where the Buffalo Bills last won a championship in 1966, hence the film's title. Billy's dad (Ben Gazzara) is a hot–tempered sleazeball, who will erupt with an outburst without provocation and takes every opportunity he can get to grope Layla.

Of course, Billy's true agenda cannot be just to see his dysfunctional parents (if it was, the movie would only be 45 minutes long). His other mission is to kill the Bills' place–kicker, whom Billy theorizes is solely responsible for landing him in prison five years earlier.

Gallo and Ricci give more than adequate performances. Gallo, having also co–written the script and composed the score, tells a semi–autobiographical tale through Billy. He even shot the film in his hometown and used an actual recording of his father's singing that Gazzara lip–synes to. Gallo, looking like a junkie in need of a fix, creates a very interesting character with Billy. Unfortunately the same cannot be said for Layla. Ricci, having gave excellent performances in this year's Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, The Opposite of Sex, and most recently in John Water's Pecker, is not given much to work with, but does the best she can with her underdeveloped character. Layla remains an enigma throughout the film. It is incomprehensible that Layla is attracted to Billy, since he is so vile to her. Layla lets Billy know that she has feelings long before Billy starts to show any shred of decency.

The movie looks as if it were shot on the cheapest, grainiest film stock available (it is not clear if this decision was due to the small budget, or an artistic choice). The cinematography gets kudos for its odd camera angles, intriguing subjective shots, and beautiful composition. Especially in the shots where what we believe to be a still frame, actually turns out to be a combination of a steadi–cam shot and a still frame, giving the image some dimension. The editing, however, comes off as a lame and tired attempt to be avant–garde. The picture–in–picture techniques employed for the flashback sequences have been used before in Peter Greenaway's The Pillow Book and the constant jump–cuts used in the beginning of the film date back to 1959 with Jean Luc Godard's Breathless.

Overall, Gallo proves himself a worthy, fledgling filmmaker with Buffalo '66. Hopefully he will find a better vehicle for his talents in the future. B–

Demme is a filmmaker that works sparsely, collecting a diverse body of work, from documentaries to the Academy Award winning The Silence of the Lambs.

Perhaps it was a blessing then, that his unique combination of spookiness and emotion was brought to the table in Beloved. Helping him was a brilliant screenplay co-written by Richard LaGravenese (The Fisher King, The Bridges of Madison County) and acting chops from Danny Glover, Kimberly Elise and Thandie Newton, who plays the title role.

As one of Hollywood's most anticipated fall releases, Beloved is sure to cause a stir and a few queasy stomachs from audience members. Full of both magical and churning visuals, it's not a movie you go to see for a good time. But it's important to remember that while Winfrey works in the entertainment business, she has always achieved her incredible success by making us think.

As a result of the uncharacteristic depth on the UMass roster, Flint, with a bit of influence from his veteran players, has opted to delight the fans by employing a faster, more aggressive style of basketball.

"That's our plan, to run a press a little bit more. The players asked me to do it, so I said 'OK,' but we have to do certain things," he said. "Guys have to be willing to get in better shape. And if [those] guys aren't running up and down the court, then we'll go back to walking [the ball] up the court and playing half court."

Minutemen Notes: In an attempt to ensure fan support for his unusually large number of home games, Flint has decided to showcase his team across the campus, claiming he "will knock on frat row doors" to boost student involvement. The third-year coach will also be present today at the campus center concourse with the mascot at his side.

After a minuscule number of home games during the past two seasons, Flint and the entire athletic program rewarded the Amherst faithful with 14 games at the Mullins Center, two of which come against national powerhouses such as UConn and Kansas.

"We just wanted to get more home games, actually," said Flint, who felt his Minutemen would benefit from a schedule which involved relatively light traveling. "And that's important. I think the fans deserve some better home games, and actually, we've played something like 21 home games since I've been the coach, and 65 games [total]. Only 21 home games. That's tough. We're not playing any slouches."

BOOK–TV: Television about reading

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — If your favorite weekend relaxation is curling up on a couch with a good book, there's a television station for you.

Wait a minute. Isn't a TV station for book readers a natural contradiction? Wasn't TV supposed to be the death of reading?

Wouldn't most TV executives be happy to see books thrown onto a big pile and torched?

Yes, yes and yes, some might imagine. But Brian Lamb has the luxury of doing things differently.

For one thing, the founder of C-SPAN devours a new book most weekends to prepare for interviews with authors on the weekly show, "Booknotes." And since he doesn't wait by the computer each morning to have his mood elevated or destroyed by ratings numbers, he has been able to turn the spinoff network C-SPAN 2 into a haven for bookworms.

"Booknotes," the one-hour Sunday show, has been a C-SPAN fixture for the past decade. Last month, the spinoff channel C-SPAN 2 quietly became BOOK TV for 48 hours each weekend, starting Saturdays at 8 a.m. Programming includes book readings and discussions, interviews with authors and news about the publishing industry. While BOOK TV stresses nonfiction, with a natural emphasis on politics and history, it loosens up from time to time to talk about children's books.

"No one else is doing it," Lamb said during a visit to New York to meet with publishing executives. "This will be more attention paid to books on television than there has ever been."

C-SPAN's move in this direction was gradual. A 1988 interview with Neil Sheehan, author of "A Bright Shining Lie," went so well that Lamb launched "Booknotes." Presidents Nixon, Carter and Clinton have each appeared on the show to discuss their books.

Last year, C-SPAN appointed a team to coordinate book programming and produced a nine-month series retracing the steps of Alexis de Tocqueville when he wrote "Democracy in America."

In C-SPAN's world, publishing and politics go hand in hand, from "The Federalist Papers" all the way to "Primary Colors."

"The whole foundation of what American democracy is all about comes from books," Lamb said.

Part of the reason for launching BOOK TV was to raise C-SPAN 2's profile, to make it known for more than carrying U.S. Senate proceedings and overflow material from its older network sibling, Lamb said. C-SPAN is available in about 73 million of the nation's nearly 100 million cable homes. C-SPAN 2 is in half the homes. If it catches on, the weekend of books may be a prototype for an entire network, he said.

Lamb wants as many viewers as possible, of course, but his professional life doesn't depend on it. The two C-SPANs are nonprofit and don't subscribe to a ratings service that estimates viewer numbers.

So Lamb doesn't really know how many people are watching when he interviews an author, much less how many are wearing tweed.

There is anecdotal evidence that fans are out there; Lamb's "Booknotes: America's Finest Authors on Reading, Writing and the Power of Ideas" spent seven weeks on the New York Times best-seller list after it debuted in 1997. C-SPAN received more than 10,000 responses when it offered free book marks to 500 viewers.

Authors enjoy appearing on "Booknotes" because Lamb is consistently well informed about their work, said Laurie Brown, vice president of marketing for the publisher Farrar Straus Giroux.

Is BOOK TV in place to become to publishing what MTV is to music?

Volleyball team returns home

By James Murphy
Collegian Staff

Home, sweet home.

That's exactly what UMass women's volleyball coach Bonnie Kenny will be saying as her team returns home after playing 11 of their last 13 matches on the road.

The Minutewomen must have tapped their shoes together while chanting "there's no place like home...there's no place like home," because nine of their next 11 matches are at home, including the next five.

After an impressive sweep of St. Bonaventure last weekend, the Minutewomen are glad to be home.

"It's definitely nice to be home," Kenny said. "We have two tough back to back matches, though, in Dayton and Xavier. Xavier just swept Virginia Tech and nobody has done that all season. They have a strong middle force in Gabrielle Cook, and Beth Osterday has also been good for them. Basically, they're good all around."

The same can be said for Dayton as well, who according to Kenny, "has a very balanced attack."

"This is a big weekend for us. This weekend ends the first round of A-10 play. If we want to be playing after Thanksgiving [in the A-10 championships], we have to put together a nice string of wins here. Again, it's good to be at home, though."

Of the next five home matches, four are A-10 tilts, and the other is against UConn. UMass is 8-9 overall and 5-3 in the A-10 now. There are 13 matches left in the season, 12 are A-10 and, as stated before, 11 are home.

If UMass does want to advance to postseason, they hold their own destiny. They have survived the long road home fairly well, and with the remainder of the season mainly against conference foes at home, the Minutewomen have a chance to do some damage. However, UMass will have to continue to play together.

One strong point of this squad, according to Coach Kenny, is "we always have six players ready to go. Xavier or Dayton may have a superstar, but we always have six show up and as long as that happens we should be alright."

Hopefully the friendly hardwood of Curry Hicks Cage will help the Minutewomen continue their solid team play as they face-off against the Flyers of Dayton tonight at 7 p.m. and tomorrow at the same time against the Musketeers of Xavier.

Minutewomen Notes: Junior outside hitter Kari Hogancamp set a new career-high of 21 against Rhode Island. Hogancamp had a total of 31 kills and 21 digs on the week while recording two more double-doubles, giving her 11 on the season. She now leads the team in digs (266) and in service aces (20).junior Jill Meyers leads the team in kills (262) as she accounted for 22 against Rhode Island and 13 against St. Bonaventure.

Men's soccer looks for first home win

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

After notching their first win of the season, the Massachusetts men's soccer team will now look to pick up their first home wins at Totman Field this weekend.

The Minutemen (1–9–2, 1–3–1 A–10) will play host to the Ohio contingent of the Atlantic 10, beginning with today's encounter with Xavier, and concluding with Sunday's match against Dayton on Sunday afternoon.

UMass earned their first victory, with 1–0 triumph at George Washington last Friday, but they will now meet their toughest challenges to date.

Xavier will storm into Amherst sporting a 9–5 overall record, and a spotless 5–0 mark in the A–10.

The Musketeers will be led by one of the A–10's premier players in Josh Hammerschmidt. The star has netted five goals and booted out 10 assists to lead the Xavier squad with 20 points.

Koen Kuiken will be another player to keep an eye on, as he has posted six goals and four assists for 16 points.

Defensively, Xavier will send Paul Wesseling to guard between the posts. Wesseling will enter the game with 70 saves in 14 games played.

On Sunday, UMass will face a Flyer team that has compiled a 6–7 overall record, but an impressive 4–1 mark in the A–10.

The one upside for UMass on paper is that Dayton has fared poorly on the road thus far, at 1–5 for the year.

While Dayton may not have the same level of star players that Xavier has to work with, they do have talent spread throughout the roster.

R.J. Kaszuba will lead the charge for the Flyers, as he amassed 12 points thus far on five goals, and two assists.

Dayton coach Jim Launder has given playing time to all three of his goalies this season, but look for Tim McCarthy who has played in 10 games to get the call for Dayton on Sunday.

McCarthy has saved 46 shots while allowing 13 goals, while logging 868 minutes overall.

The Minutemen still have plans of finishing strong in the A–10, and will have a chance to get back on track with their first home games since a Sept. 26 1–1 tie against Rhode Island.

Over the course of their road journeys, UMass was 1–3, as they were outscored 10–4.

The Minutemen have been working some new faces into the lineup, while attempting to overcome some key losses due to injuries.

Jonathan Bibb went down at Fresno State earlier this season, and Seth Lilburn was lost for the season against Rhode Island.

Massachusetts coach Sani Koch in the meantime has been playing newcomers J.R. Pouncey, Fred Kinateder, and Mike Janusz with more frequency.

UMass cross country squads to accept Beantown challenge

By Sean Lavoine and Matt Despres
Collegian Correspondents

Boston is one of the most famous places in the world for running. Whether it is an afternoon jog along the Charles River or a 26 mile run in the Boston Marathon, running enthusiasts all over the world love to run in Boston.

Boston is exactly where the University of Massachusetts men's and women's cross country teams will be today as they race in the New England Championships at Franklin Park.

The 12:45 p.m. race will feature 30 to 40 teams from all regions of New England. Unlike most races that UMass competes in, this race is open to schools of all divisions, not just Division I.

Coming off of a tenth place finish at the Meet of Champions two weeks ago, the UMass women's team has needed time to recuperate from team illnesses.

"I'm glad we had two weeks off. The kids have been so sick," coach Julie LaFremiere said.

Today's race may be more of the same for the Minutewomen because two of the team's top seven runners are not feeling well.

Junior Sally Hirsch and Senior Tracy Meagher are the latest members to fall ill.

"Both have had respiratory problems during the past week, and Sally has already had two sprained ankles this season," LaFremiere said.

Hopefully UMass will be able to overcome their current illness and post a good finish in today's race.

The teams that are expected to fare well are Boston College, Dartmouth, Rhode Island, and nationally ranked Providence, whose squad is currently in the top five.

"I expect Providence to be right up at the top, and Boston University could do well because it is their home course," LaFremiere said.

Men's Cross Country hoping for good showing

The last time we heard from the Massachusetts men's cross country team, they had traveled to the Bronx and posted an impressive ninth place finish at the annual Meet of Champions. That was nearly two weeks ago.

This long of a hiatus in most sports is usually a major cause for concern. Hockey players will question their timing, basketball players their ability to run the floor, and football players their sense of picking up the blitz.

In the world of cross country, however, things are a little different. It's a sport where no definite line is drawn. The Minutemen will see how they handle the extra long break as they travel to Franklin Park in Boston today to take part in the New England Championships.

"The two week gap is certainly something to consider" UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "You never really know how things will go. We could be rested and run really well, or we could turn up rusty. We have been battling the flu, but we are starting to come back."

The meet will be the largest that UMass runs in this year, with 300 runners representing 42 schools. Franklin Park has a long tradition of hosting cross country meets, which makes it an ideal place to host a meet of this size. O'Brien thinks that, despite strong squads such as Providence, Dartmouth and Brown, attention must be paid to everyone.

"Those three schools are the odds-on favorites to take the top three spots, but teams like UConn, Harvard and BC must be watched. Along with us, they are right there in the mix to place in the Top 10. I think we'll run well."

UConn on the schedule for men's tennis as team looks to regain lost confidence

By Matthew Frascella
Collegian Staff

After enduring a 6–1 beating by host Connecticut on Tuesday, the Massachusetts men's tennis team found itself in a rather unfamiliar position.

When a team is struggling, it looks for almost anything that can get it back on track. A convenient schedule break from team competition for the Minutemen this weekend may be the perfect tonic for a return to their victorious form displayed during the season's first two contests.

In contrast to the usual routine of team play, UMass will be participating in individual competition during the New England Championships, held this weekend in Storrs, Connecticut.

The tournament will feature two doubles brackets and four singles brackets, in which players will be grouped by seed.

Massachusetts head coach Judy Dixon will bring her team up against a multitude of New England Division I schools, hoping this weekend's slate of matches can get her team back on track.

"We lost that extra edge," said Dixon, who watched her team struggle against UConn. "We are trying to get that edge back this weekend."

Along with its coach, the team itself has recognized that something must be done to regain old form. The Husky loss was a wake-up call for the Minutemen.

"Since we lost to UConn quite decisively, we had a team meeting in which I said very little," she said. "They spoke up, noting the need for more desire and intensity. They need to do what UMass has always done: want to win."

Winning may prove more difficult though with the loss of junior Parsa Samii. Samii went down in the match against the Huskies with a sprained ankle and will not accompany his teammates to Storrs this weekend.

The recent one–sided victory by Connecticut has left Dixon with some concerns for her team. She has stressed throughout the season that this is the most talented men's tennis team that she has ever coached here at UMass, yet the team is struggling.

"Team confidence is way down, and the only way to get that back is to work harder on the practice courts and especially in the matches," said Dixon.

UMass will get a chance this weekend to regain some of its lost confidence by playing competitively in matches that do not count toward team standing. The individual tournament style already helped the Minutemen tune-up prior to the start of the season, proving fruitful with two early victories.

A major challenge to the team is the fact that they must return to the scene of their recent demise, Storrs, Conn.

cess has been its young defense, anchored by sophomore goaltender Zowie Tucker.

"We're starting to take care of things in front of the cage," said Shea, who was referring to the team defense in front of the goal. "We really weren't getting the job done earlier in the season. We have a really young defense that just needed to be seasoned with some game experience."

"Zowie has been playing with a lot of confidence, and she's having fun out there at the same time. She's been taking care of all the things she needs to do."

Although the Minutewomen toped the Owls twice in 1997, Shea remains cautiously optimistic, giving her team only an edge in experience.

"Temple is a young team, and when you have younger players, they're not always seasoned to the rivalry. They just love to play the game," she said. "That's really the X-factor for us. We know that everybody comes out ready to play against UMass."

Shea also expressed concern for the St. Joseph's contest, which she feels will produce intense play.

"St. Joseph's has a new coach who has done some great things with the program already," Shea said. "They may be 5–6 overall, but they're 1–0 in the A–10 with a win over Temple. It'll be a tough game for us."

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be unusually stubborn today. Don't be fooled by someone who claims to have something you need, when he or she is really begging.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may be nervous today about a new project, but count on someone you know to prevent a mistake from happening.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You're in no mood to be pushed around today. However, don't present yourself in a way that invites others to become aggressive or intrusive.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may be asking yourself how to do certain things today. Why do it alone? Employ the help of others.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — It will take a great deal to stir your anger today, but realize your threshold for tolerance. Use care.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Now is not the time to hold a grudge. No matter what the reactions are, forgive and forget!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Do you really feel that you're in a situation that promotes trust among friends and allies? If not, then the time has come to make a change.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Someone will be eager to hear your deepest, darkest secrets today, but don't assume she or he will do the same.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You usually make friends quickly and with relative ease, but you may be feeling rather "on guard" today. Keep your cool!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You're interested in broadening your circle of allies, but knowing just how to promote your ideas and get others to pledge support may be another story.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Don't expect or allow someone who has pledged friendship to back away when things get rough. A true friend should see you through the good and the bad.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You're in the mood for something special today. During evening hours, a loved one may treat you to something rather luxurious.

A fresh face atop the Noles' ACC; Mauser's picks

Through the years of Casey Weldon, Danny Kanell, Thad Busby, and now Chris Weinke, Florida State notched a 47–1 record in their six-year reign atop the Atlantic Coast Conference. Coach Bobby Bowden crossed his arms and chuckled, with that Green Giant look, as the little peas of the ACC beat each other up before the Giant put his foot down, squashing the little snacks. And snacks they were, indeed, for the Seminoles to inhale in their march for a national championship.

Brett Mauser
on College Football

This year, though, it's a different story. These 'Noles ain't those 'Noles everyone's used to. These 'Noles were embarrassed in losing to North Carolina State, and have had less-than-convincing victories over Maryland and Duke.

The opportunity is there for the little peas to poison the giant. This weekend in Atlanta, when No. 6 Virginia and No. 25 Georgia Tech clash, only one will stand alone on top, and for once, it won't be Florida State.

The Ramblin' Wreck has opened some eyes in the weeks past, having scored 40 or more points in each of the contests, en route to a 4–0 record and a spot in the polls. The city of Atlanta is buzzing about their upstart Yellowjackets, but it's about time these bees started thinking about slam dunks and scoring funks.

Yeah, the rout of North Carolina State was impressive, very impressive, at that, but the test is tomorrow, as they take on the Cavaliers who enter the game with the nation's fourth best scoring defense.

Four wins following a 41–31 loss to Boston College has put the 'Jackets in the money. Quarterback Joe Hamilton led the onslaught in Raleigh and against Virginia, will have to copy that performance. Charles Wiley, last year's starting tailback and short yardage back, went down with an injured right knee following his third touchdown run of the year. Hamilton, in the expected 80-degree heat on Saturday, will need to do a lot of things that he may or may not be able to do.

Deep in the secondary, though, lurks the real problem for Georgia Tech. Hiding behind trees, popping out of the ground, Anthony Poindexter, an odds-on favorite for All-America honors, will make Hamilton cringe each time the ball leaves his hand. The senior strong safety leads the team in tackles and interceptions, on a defense that holds opponents to 93 yards passing per game.

For the Yellowjackets to succeed, they will need to keep Hamilton happy in the pocket and somehow stop junior running back Thomas Jones. While the Cavs' defense gets all the adulation, the offense ain't too shabby, either. Giving a mere half point on the road is a bargain, so I'm going to take the Cavs. Virginia 24, Georgia Tech 20.

Mauser's Toilet Bowl Picks of the Week:

Last week: 1–2 <grumble grumble>

Season: 7–5

In a game equally intriguing, Purdue visits Happy Valley to find where it belongs. In three road losses decided by only 16 points, the Boilermakers head eastward to take on the Nittany Lions. The story is Drew Brees, the sophomore quarterback who inherited a team that had its first winning season since 1984. With Billy Dicken gone, the apparent resolution to helping an inexperienced quarterback would be to pound away on the ground, a la alum Mike Alstott.

Or to throw 80 times a game.

Brees, in last week's 31–24 loss to Wisconsin, completed 55 of 85 passes for 494 yards. And that isn't a typo.

Coach Joe Tiller, the mastermind to last year's 9–3 record, would love to throw more of the same at the Lions, but Saturday's forecast is still up in the air. Tiller has to be hoping for clear skies for Brees's aerial assault to take full form. Otherwise, with possible drizzly weather in the cards, they would have to rely on a hapless running game.

Weather might not need to decide this one, though. At 3–3, Purdue cannot settle for yet another moral victory on the road. Brees, who registered 522 yards and six touchdowns in beating Minnesota two weeks ago, needs to keep his own defense off of the field with sustained drives. That will require a rushing attack to keep the defense honest. Joe Paterno understands the inexperience that Brees brings to the table. Expect a lot of nickel and dime formations on Brees. After two field days, Brees will need to work for this one. And that Boilermaker defense will have to keep the Nittany Lions in their cage.

But let's be realistic here.

I'll take Penn State at home, giving 8 1/2 to Purdue.

On the undercard, I vow Virginia Tech will cure the large spread, half point loss spells and defeat Temple by at least 35 1/2. And finally, gimme Louisville on the road against Tulane, getting 15 1/2 points.

Midnight Madness tonight for UM hoops

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

'Twas the night before madness, and all through UMass, no one was shooting hoops, not even one pass. The students were nestled all snug in their beds, as visions of the Final Four danced in their heads. The banner was hung over the court with care, in hope that Saint Flint would soon lead them back there.

After a seven month and four day absence, the Massachusetts men's basketball has returned. Tonight's Midnight Madness congregation at the William D. Mullins Center marks the beginning of a 1998–99 campaign — a season in which UMass head coach Bruiser Flint hopes to lead Minuteman basketball back to the promised land with the help of resurgent fan hysteria.

"I'm looking forward to another great year, and I'm looking forward to Midnight Madness Friday night," Flint said while addressing the media on Tuesday. "We're going to have a pretty good time. We've got some special things set up... we're getting ready to kick [the season] off, and I'm really excited — excited about the home games, and the schedule that we have."

With the aid of 14 home games, as well as high preseason expectations, fan interest may reach an all-time high. After returning almost his entire squad from last season, in addition to a handful of new talent, Flint will not settle for another first round exit from the NCAA Tournament.

"That's a good motivational point," Flint said of his team's two consecutive opening-round postseason losses. "The guys don't want to go to the tournament and be out in the first round, they want to make a run. That's one of the things I've been bringing up to the players. I think there are a lot of other schools that just want to get to the tournament. We don't just want to get to the tournament. We want to get back to the Final Four. We want to win the National Championship."

Although The Sporting News has UMass ranked as low as No. 33, ESPN college basketball analyst Dick Vitale, as well as most other media covering the Minutemen, feel that Flint's squad will likely rise to the No. 15–20 range when the national rankings are released before the end of October.

"You get ranked because you deserved to get ranked. We've got everybody back but one player," said Flint, who admitted a national rank can be interpreted as a sign of respect. "We've got four of our five starters [returning] and our sixth man is back. There are three or four guys that give us some more depth, so I expected to be ranked."

Included in the Midnight Madness festivities will be the individual introduction of each player, which precedes the team scrimmage and the popular slam-dunk contest.

Despite a cast on his hand, reigning champion and Minuteman starting small forward Mike Babul captured the contest crown in 1997 after dazzling the crowd by dunking the ball over a seated player.

UMass travels to UConn, rivals rematch

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

It doesn't get any better than this. Tomorrow, the University of Connecticut Huskies will host the Massachusetts football team for possibly the most anticipated game of the season to date.

No two schools have a bigger rivalry than UMass and UConn, and few games around the nation can boast the level of competition that this one can.

"[The players] have been practicing with more intensity and we've jumped the practices up as coaches, also," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said. "You know, I see it from the people around here that it's a big game. It's an away game, but everybody's kind of looking forward to the game. That obviously means there's a rivalry intact."

To make things even more interesting, both teams enter the game with 4–1 records. The Minutemen have an edge in the Atlantic 10 rankings with an undefeated conference record over two games, while the Huskies have a mediocre 1–1 mark. However, UConn holds an advantage in the national rankings, with a No. 15 spot compared to UMass' No. 18 showing.

Working in Massachusetts' favor, for the first time in three weeks, the defense will be healthy.

"Khari [Samuel, starting linebacker] is fine, now," Whipple said. "Compton [Webster, linebacker] has practiced all week long. So, we're in good shape."

Connecticut's starting quarterback, Shane Stafford, however, who ranks sixth in the country in passing efficiency, will not play this weekend due to a broken collarbone suffered in the first quarter of the Huskies' 40–18 shellacking of No. 13 Hofstra last weekend. Taking Stafford's place will be redshirt sophomore Brian Hoffman.

"I think [Hoffman's] skills are complimentary to Stafford's," Whipple said. "Obviously, the thing he lacks is experience. Maybe they'll limit his package, but I'm not sure what they're going to do. He did a good job [last week in the victory against Hofstra] – they seemed to run a little more early, then they let him throw it some. It looks like he scrambles a little better than Stafford, and that always gives you some problems...We've just got to change things up and play our game. We can't really worry about him too much."

In comparison, accomplished junior Todd Bankhead will be behind center for UMass. Bankhead holds three of the top four single-game passing performances in Massachusetts history after playing only five games. His 15 touchdowns to 2 interceptions is the best ratio in the A-10.

Bankhead will be handing the ball off to tailback Marcel Shipp, who is quickly becoming an All-America candidate. Shipp has recorded three consecutive 100 yard games, and has 967 combined yards so far this year.

The two will spearhead an attack on a UConn defense that has allowed 442.6 yards and 27 points a game.

The storied history that the two teams share draws fans to this matchup. The last time UConn and UMass met, the Huskies destroyed the Minutemen by a score of 49– 6 at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium last fall. Massachusetts holds a 33–31–2 advantage in the all-time series.

"A lot of our kids know their kids, and we're recruiting the same kind of guys," Whipple said. "I think that adds to the rivalry, and I think it's a good time to play somebody that we know."

After UConn, the Minutemen will be back home to play Villanova for Homecoming.

UMass hockey heads off to MSU for opener

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Talk about a baptism by fire.

Untested except for an exhibition with Concordia College last Friday night, the Massachusetts hockey team will dive head first into its 1998–99 schedule tomorrow night at 7 p.m. when it will face No. 5 Michigan State in its season opener at Munn Arena in East Lansing, Mich.

The Minutemen are coming off a 6–24–3 mark in 1997–98, and lost 10 seniors from that squad. The Spartans, on the other hand, finished up last season at 33–6–5 and were the champions of the CCHA.

Playing tough competition is nothing new for UMass, however. After all, the Minutemen play their regular season schedule in Hockey East, the most prestigious college hockey conference in the nation.

"Michigan State is fourth or fifth depending on what poll that you look at, but what difference is it really when teams from last year like BU [Boston University] and UNH [New Hampshire] were highly-ranked too," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "It's going to be a good game and a good test of everything that we've been working on."

Leading the way for the Spartans is All-American senior captain Mike York. The center led Michigan State with 61 points last season [27 goals, 34 assists] and is a pre-season favorite to win the Hobey Baker Award.

Complementing York offensively will be sophomore right winger Rustyn Dolyny [20–24–44 in 1997–98], senior left winger Bryan Adams [9–21–30], junior center Shawn Horcoff [14–13–27] and defenseman Mike Weaver, Brad Hodgins, and Jeff Kozakowski.

The goaltending situation for the Spartans will see a changing of the guard, as sophomore Joe Blackburn will take the place of the departed Chad Alban. Blackburn was 2– 2 last season in limited action.

UMass will rely on a balanced attack this season for victories. A squad with only two seniors, and primarily comprised of freshmen and sophomores, the Minutemen will need to see contributions from every player.

"For this team to be successful, we're going to need everyone to step up," senior alternate captain Bryan Fitzgerald said. "We need it [a complete effort] from the guys on the first line through the fourth line to Markus [Helanen, UMass starting goalie] to the backup goalie. It's going to be a team effort."

Junior Dean Stork will captain this year's squad and lead the defensive unit, while junior Jeff Blanchard and Fitzgerald will assist Stork.

"Absolutely," Blanchard said in response to a question about readiness. "They're [Michigan State] a good team, and playing them shouldn't hurt us at all."

UMass heads to Ohio for two key games

The future is now for the Massachusetts women's soccer team. The postseason future, that is.

If the Minutewomen want to mold themselves into solid ground and head in the right direction for an Atlantic 10 tournament berth, this weekend's couplet with Xavier and Dayton will be crucial.

"It's [this weekend] certainly going to define where the A–10 is this year," UMass women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "If we win both games, then we're right on track, and we'll have a real good chance to make the tournament."

"If we lose two, though, it means that George Washington, Dayton and Xavier will pretty much be in [the A–10 tourney]. Then we'll get thrown into a group of about four or five teams for that last spot, and it's going to be a dogfight."

Xavier will be the first test, as the Minutewomen will head to Cincinnati for a Friday night affair. The Musketeers enter the weekend with a 5–5–1 mark, 3–1–1 in the A–10.

A low scoring team, Xavier has only 13 goals in 11 games, and has been shut out five times this season. Top threats for the Musketeers include Christie Reinshagen and Annette Gruber.

"Gruber is back for them. She leads in team in shots by about two to one over the next closest person," Rudy said. "[Christie] Reinshagen is the leading scorer, and her sister Amy is good too. Erin Coley is also a dangerous player."

Dayton, who will be UMass' opponent on Sunday afternoon, is on top of the A–10 along with George Washington. The Flyers sport a 9–3 record overall, and are a perfect 5–0 in the conference.

A multi-faceted group, Dayton will rely on Renee Harmeyer, Bridget Bushman and Jen Lucas to provide offensive support.

"Dayton is a little different package [compared to Xavier]. They play a lot of people, and will go about 18 deep in and out at various times," Rudy said. "Bushman and Lucas are big, strong kids who were are going to have to shut down along with Harmeyer."

The Minutewomen are coming off a 5–0 thumping of Virginia Tech on Sunday afternoon that upped their mark to 6–8, 3–2 in the conference. UMass has been hot as of late, winning four of its last six, but will need to come through once again this weekend if it has any post-season aspirations.

"If we don't beat both of those teams this weekend, then it's going to make it a lot more difficult to make the A–10 tournament," Massachusetts freshman midfielder Sarah Cook said.

And not making the A–10 tournament was never on the agenda for the Minutewomen.

Senior co-captain Sophie Lecot and the Massachusetts women's soccer team will head to Ohio this weekend to face Xavier and Dayton in two crucial A–10 matchups.

UM field hockey visits Temple Owls

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

The entire regular season comes down to this weekend for the members of Massachusetts field hockey team. One win and they're in — into the Atlantic 10 Tournament, that is.

After jumping out to a perfect 2–0 start within their conference, the Minutewomen travel to Temple Saturday, and St. Joseph's on Sunday. A win in either contest would secure at least a fourth–place finish for UMass (8–5), and a spot in A–10 postseason play.

"We know that we have to take care of Temple. That's really our goal because one win will put us in the conference tournament," said Massachusetts coach Patty Shea, citing the difficulty in winning any Atlantic–10 game. "You've got to take care of your conference to go on any further. Each conference game takes focus and complete concentration."

Despite the challenge facing this weekend, the Minutewomen will travel to Philadelphia with momentum on their side, winning seven of their last nine contests, including the last four.

"Providence was a hard-fought win for us," said Shea, who feels that her team's most recent victory may have boosted its spirits. "We dealt with tough weather conditions. A win like that starts to give you a lot of confidence. We're going to take nothing for granted, though."

One of the contributing factors toward the recent UMass string of suc-

UMass childcare crisis a concern for many; GEO offers solutions

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) at the University of Massachusetts, is concerned about a rising number of single parents at the University, and an overload of children in on-campus child care.

Members of GEO say the there is a lack of available child care for students with children. They insist that the cost of child care is increasing, leaving most graduate and undergraduate parents without funding for their own education.

For GEO Family Issues Advocate Thanh Duong, the University isn't acknowledging the need for more child care facilities. Duong feels the lack of on-campus child care is increasing the costs for single parents having to seek the necessary child care themselves.

"There are 25,000 students on campus, around 6,000 graduate students, and neither the University or ourselves have been able to find out how many single parents are out there," Duong said. "Many of these graduate students have children of their own, and are not receiving the necessary help that they need."

On Nov. 2, GEO members plan to meet with the University to discuss the issue, and possibly come to an agreement over finding an available space for additional childcare services.

About 20 years ago, 250 children were enrolled in a child care facility on campus, but there's been a sharp decline in day care since then.

Currently, only 78 children are now part of the Child Care Center that is managed and operated by the University. However, because it is the only child care facility on campus, it is overenrolled and many single-parent students are on a waiting list for more available openings.

In an attempt to remedy the situation, GEO has proposed building a second, more flexible child care center that would also be operated by the University.

Nancy deProsse, a United Auto Worker, Local 2322 staff person assigned to work with GEO, feels that the new child care center would meet the growing needs of single parent students.

Pipeline explosion caused by siphoning

LAGOS, Nigeria — A pipeline explosion apparently sparked by thieves siphoning off oil led to an inferno that killed at least 250 people, destroyed villages and charred surrounding cropland. The fire began late Saturday and was still raging last night. An official death toll was not available, but journalists and witnesses on the scene near the town of Jesse, 180 miles southeast of Lagos, estimated that at least 250 people were killed.

There were 230 bodies in one pile of corpses, journalists said, and residents said at least a dozen more bodies already had been taken away by relatives. In addition, some of the injured taken to area hospitals had died, officials said.

W.V. man stabs family before killing himself

GRAFTON, W.Va. — Instead of celebrating a homecoming dance, about 300 high school students and parents held a candlelight vigil to mourn the stabbing death of a popular classmate.

Several girls who apparently hadn't gotten word of Jamie Cleavenger's death arrived Saturday night at the Grafton school in homecoming gowns, only to break down in tears when they heard the news.

At a football game the day before, many of the same people held a moment of silence for a boy in neighboring Fairmont who was killed Thursday in a car accident. That followed an accidental fatal shooting of a Clarksburg boy on Tuesday.

"It just hasn't been a good couple weeks for this area," Grafton police officer J.E. Hinebaugh said Sunday. Fairmont and Clarksburg, with about 20,000 residents each, lie along Interstate 79 just 20 miles apart in northern West Virginia. With Grafton, population 6,000, to the east, people in the three towns form a tight-knit triangle. They're friendly rivals in the sports arena. They're friends and neighbors outside of school. So when 16-year-old Jeff Conley was killed Tuesday while he and two friends were playing with a shotgun, people in neighbors heard the news. And they expressed shock again when an auto accident killed Seth Burton, 17, the captain of the Fairmont Senior High School cross-country team, and injured five teammates Thursday.

Hillel coffee house to occur weekly; students and staff excited by turnout

By Renee Cohn
Collegian Correspondent

If you've been looking for a regular coffee house event at the University of Massachusetts, you can stop searching.

Hillel House is now holding a "coffee house" every Tuesday from 8:30-10 p.m. that is open to the public.

The weekly coffee house will have performances of music and poetry from members of the community, as well as coffee, free desserts and space and time available to just hang out.

The room used for the program is transformed into a coffee house by way of dimmed lighting, the aroma of coffee beans, an ample stage area, and comfy seating to watch the performances.

Neil Morris, the Master of Ceremonies for the first coffee house, held last Tuesday night, said it was, "a good community event."

When asked if performing was intimidating, he commented that everyone was "extremely open and receptive."

Several people in attendance repeatedly mentioned the "strip show" as a favorite of the night.

"It was a wild show experience," Morris said.

Aaron Philmus, a student performer, summarized the skit.

"Standing on a plastic chair, doing a little dancing with some music... It was a good time, that we couldn't have done without such a friendly group of people," Philmus said.

Philmus encouraged more spectators to come to the next coffee house to find out if the popular skit would be repeated.

"They'll just have to come and find out," he said.

There were other performances at the event and the audience responded positively to everything from the original and recited poetry, to music and skits.

Several audience members and performers said the atmosphere was very amiable.

Dan Kapner, the organizer for the coffee house, summed up the atmosphere of the evening.

"Basically laid-back, friendly, and a great social environment," Kapner said.

Anyone, regardless of religion, is welcome to come and enjoy the environment, or even muster up the courage to perform.

Individuals are encouraged to read a copy of a favorite poem, play the guitar, or share a joke with the audience.

If the coffee house attendees grow in number, the event may be moved to the Bluewall, but Hillel will be the location for the next several coffee houses.

Anyone craving some mood-lighting, a laid-back friendly atmosphere, and a good old cup of joe can go to Hillel House every Tuesday night.

The coffee house is also branching out to the five-college area, to include performers and audience members from across the Pioneer Valley. For more information, contact Dan Kapner at 549-6411.

Israel and Palestine peace talks extended

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

QUEENSTOWN, Md. — Prodded by U.S. mediation at the highest levels, Middle East peace negotiations were stalled yesterday over key elements of a land-for-peace deal between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Clinton administration appealed to the two sides to find the "political will" to settle issues that have generated 19 months of stalemate and extended the talks past Sunday's projected finish. "It is in the best interest of the peace process and the discussions we have been having," State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said in announcing that the Israeli and Palestinian delegations would remain overnight at the secluded summit retreat and that there "almost certainly" would be talks today. Separately, a White House spokesperson told a group of reporters that "talks almost certainly will go into tomorrow. We believe it's in the best interests of the peace process to continue the discussions."

A significant stumbling block involved security guarantees for Israel as part of a deal to give up land on the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority, diplomatic sources said. American assertions that the summit was timed to end Sunday night gave way to a statement by Rubin that "we are taking this one meeting at a time."

The U.S. strategy, at least for now, is to push for a full agreement and not sign off on the approach Israel evidently favors of "locking in" the issues resolved and declaring them settled. On the fourth day of talks, President Clinton and Vice President Al Gore rode separate helicopters to the Wye Plantations hideaway on Maryland's Eastern Shore to work with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat to break the impasse.

Clinton conferred with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and other senior advisers for 40 minutes, then had lunch with Netanyahu. Arafat and Netanyahu have not met face-to-face for two days, and there has been no three-way meeting, which would signal progress.

"There is time to complete the work if the political will is there to make the tough decisions," Rubin said.

While diplomatic sources said the likely result of the summit was a partial agreement, Rubin said, "We have no plan to defe. Issues for many weeks."

He also cautioned that without an accord "there are serious dangers ahead for the people of the Middle East."

"There's important work being done here," Lockhart said after Clinton arrived from Washington for his third day of mediation between the two sides.

The United States is trying to broker an agreement in which Israel would exchange territory for tougher action by the Palestinian authorities to prevent terrorist strikes against Israelis. Diplomatic sources said completing a final deal could take weeks or longer.

Death toll rises as storms whip southeastern Texas

By Pauline Arrillaga
Associated Press

HOUSTON — More bodies were pulled from floodwaters in central Texas as torrential storms continued a deadly march eastward across the state yesterday, killing one man whose mobile home was swept away by a twister.

At least ten people died in the weekend storms. The latest victim, an unidentified man, died yesterday when a tornado swept through Waller County just after sunrise, demolishing mobile homes and snapping trees in Brookshire, 35 miles west of Houston. No other injuries were reported, but authorities across southeast Texas spent the day evacuating families by boat after as much as 15 inches of rain fell in some areas overnight.

"Just virtually every county road is impassible," Sheriff Randy Smith said. "It's just everywhere."

Four shelters were opened in Waller County for victims of the rising waters. Pat Snow, his wife and three children took refuge after three and a half feet of water forced them out of their home.

"We were trying to put things up, and a floating tree hit the front door and broke it open," Snow said. "The water rushed in and started pushing all the furniture against the back wall." As the wall began to crumble, Snow rushed his family up to the attic, broke a hole in the roof and scrambled out. They were rescued by boat.

In central Texas, residents began cleaning up from floods caused by more than 12 inches of rain.

A man and two women were washed away in cars in San Antonio, while an eight-year-old girl was swept from a car in Pflugerville, northeast of Austin. Another man was killed when a tornado slammed into his mobile home near Corsicana, 220 miles northeast of San Antonio.

On Sunday morning, a woman authorities believe was swept from a car by rising waters was found in northwest San Antonio. Two other flooding victims' bodies were later found. A man was found along Alligator Creek farther north in Comal County.

In Harris County, still saturated from flooding last month spawned by Tropical Storm Frances, creeks and bayous escaped their banks. Strong winds and rising waters damaged several homes.

Columbian explosion kills 45

By Frank Bajak
Associated Press

BOGOTA, Colombia — A pipeline explosion splashed oil on a rural Colombian hamlet yesterday and fire raced through the village, killing at least 45 people and injuring more than 60. Authorities suspected leftist rebels were responsible for the blast.

"The liquid spilled all over houses in the village. And no one knows exactly how the fire started," said police officer Robert Valencia in Segovia, the nearest town to Machuca village, 180 miles north of Bogota.

The 2:45 a.m. explosion destroyed most of the wooden, straw-roof huts in the town of about 150 residents, most of them gold miners, Valencia told The Associated Press by telephone. The injured were airlifted to at least six area hospitals, many with third-degree burns.

The pipeline was on a rise just above the hamlet, Valencia said. Most of the victims died at the scene and were women and children, Guillermo Franco, the Antioquia state health director, said from the state capital of Medellin.

Gen. Alfredo Salgado, operations director of the national police, said survivors described "a huge explosion and afterward a ball of flame erupted."

Defense Minister Rodrigo Lloreda said leftist rebels, who frequently sabotage Colombia's oil pipelines, were suspected. "The chances that it was a terrorist attack are stronger than the chances it was accident," he told the Radionet network. President Andres Pastrana, in Portugal for a summit of leaders from Latin America, Spain and Portugal, called the incident "a bloody attack" and sent condolences to the victims. He did not directly blame the rebels but asked them for "gestures of peace." Valencia said residents have blamed the explosion on the National Liberation Army, which operates in the area and is blamed for most oil pipeline attacks. There was no immediate comment from the rebel group.

The damaged Colombia Central pipeline, a periodic target of ELN sabotage, is operated by the state-owned Ecopetrol oil company. It transports 100,000 barrels of crude oil daily, most of it from the Cusiana oil field in east-central Colombia to the Covenas terminal on the Caribbean. The blast shut down the pipeline.

Leaders of the ELN, Colombia's second-largest rebel band, have said they blow up oil pipelines because the government has sold out to foreign oil interests. Sunday's deaths occurred exactly a week after ELN leaders held talks with government and civilian officials to establish parameters for peace talks that are to begin in February.

In talks with civilian leaders in July, the rebel group said it would curtail its attacks on pipelines. The ELN has not, however, denounced the armed struggle or said when it might agree to a cease-fire.

The rebel movement extorts money from companies that operate in rural areas it controls. Businesses that refuse to pay its "war taxes" are frequently attacked or have executives kidnapped. But the ELN has no history of intentionally targeting civilians in dynamiting oil facilities; the attacks usually occur in unpopulated areas. So far this year, rebels have sabotaged Colombian pipelines more than 62 times, 50 percent more than last year.

Palestinian sources told The Associated Press the talks "have become very difficult," particularly on whether another Israeli pullback on the West Bank would follow the one being negotiated, and on Israel's demand that terrorism suspects be extradited to Israel for trial.

However, the sources, insisting on anonymity, said Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, U.S. mediator Dennis Ross and Danny Navch, the Israeli Cabinet secretary, were working on drafts of other provisions.

Also, the sources said, CIA director George Tenet had a long meeting Saturday with Muhammed Dahlan, Palestinian security chief, and their ideas were to be presented yesterday to the Israelis. James P. Rubin, the State Department spokesman, reiterated the American position that "our goal continues to be to do all the work that needs to be done by today."

He said he had not "heard any serious discussion about a multiweek extension" of the talks.

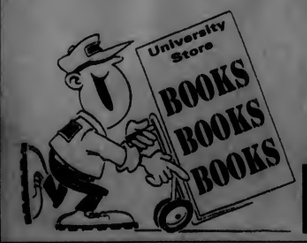
Rubin also denied an Israeli army radio report that Clinton had warned the Israelis he would support a Palestinian state if no West Bank agreement was reached. He said that did not "resemble any account that I've heard at the Wye talks, and I find it difficult to imagine."

Netanyahu also denied any such pressure had been applied. "The reports are baseless, and that option was never discussed in conversations with the prime minister and his delegation at Wye Plantation," Netanyahu's office said in Jerusalem.

Israel's newly appointed hard-line foreign minister, Ariel Sharon, and Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai arrived early Sunday at this resort area on Maryland's Eastern Shore morning to join the talks. Asked by reporters if he was optimistic, Mordechai said, "Yes, I am."

Clinton is trying to break a 19-month stalemate, but U.S. officials have made no claims of progress since the talks began Thursday.

It may take the parties a couple of weeks to work out the steps Arafat would be prepared to take to fight terrorism, and then there would probably have to be another three-way meeting convened by the United States, the diplomatic sources said.



At stake was a long-sought accord that would give the Palestinians control over more land, on which they hope to establish a state.

■ care

"For over five years, we've been trying to get the University to recognize the growing need for child-care here on campus," deProsse said. "We have been working on how to establish a low-cost, flexible day care center that will meet more of the needs of single parents."

The proposed "Flexible Child Care Center" will provide more care for children of graduate and undergraduate students. According to what GEO has offered, it would not only be affordable, but would provide extended hours of child care. The current UMass Child Care Center provides service from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. The new child care center would operate from 7:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m., an additional three and a half hours.

Over the last couple of months, GEO has been meeting with the University and has allocated the available funding and formed a plan that they both have agreed to; the problem now is finding the available space.

Single undergraduate parents like UMass junior Melina Arroyo can attest that their needs haven't been met.

"The child care fees are very high and for undergraduates, this is very expensive when compared to education costs," Arroyo said. "The University doesn't know how the graduate or undergraduate parents feel, for they don't see us struggling to support ourselves."

Arroyo has been taking her two-year-old daughter to the UMass Child Care Center since the spring of 1997, and she fears for her own future, as well as her daughter's.

Working two jobs, Arroyo is a Biology major who hopes that child care will soon become more affordable for working single parents like herself.

"As it is, I have a difficult time arranging for a babysitter to look after my daughter when I have nightly exams or review sessions," Arroyo said. "This is causing me additional inconveniences and additional costs."

Last semester, Arroyo's daughter became sick during finals week, and Arroyo missed a biology exam because the UMass Child Care Center would not care for sick children. As a consequence, she is retaking the same biology course this semester.

Arroyo feels that the new child care center would be more flexible in dealing with sick children in times of emergencies or exam periods.

According to deProsse, the most convenient and available space for the child care facility is Skinner Hall, but the School of Education wants to extend their own lab school into that empty area.

GEO is arguing that the pre-school lab only runs two hours each day, and for the hours the flexible day care is offering, it would be a much better use of space.

GEO projects a the new child care center would create more jobs opportunities for work-study students, especially those interested in going into the child care field.

Arroyo feels that time to meet the needs of some single- parent students is running out.

"I have one more year to go, and I need help because I do not want my grades to drop when it matters most," Arroyo said.

Much of Asia devastated in wake of Typhoon Zeb

By Chester Dawson
Associated Press

TOKYO — A typhoon that cut a destructive swath through Asia, killing dozens and severely disrupting transportation, weakened to a tropical storm yesterday as it moved into the Sea of Japan.

Typhoon Zeb, which killed at least 74 people in the Philippines and 25 in Taiwan, was downgraded to a tropical storm as it swirled about 90 miles west of Aomori, a city 360 miles northeast of Tokyo. At least 12 people in Japan were killed by landslides and weather-related accidents and one other was reported missing, national police said. More than 1,500 people were forced to flee their homes.

After coming ashore late Saturday in southern Japan, the storm blew into the Sea of Japan. Yesterday afternoon, it was still at sea, off the west coast of the northern main island of Hokkaido. In southwestern Japan's Okayama prefecture, a 40-year-old woman and her two school-age sons died after a landslide destroyed their house early yesterday, Kyodo News agency reported.

Another landslide killed an elderly couple and their 41-year-old son late Saturday in neighboring Hiroshima prefecture.

The storm caused the cancellation of domestic flights, including some departing from Tokyo's Haneda Airport, and disrupted train and ferry service all across Japan.

Debates shafted student body

To the editor:

This past Wednesday, October 14, 1998, Acting Governor Paul Cellucci and Attorney General Scott Harshbarger duked it out at the Mullins Center. Even though their debate was held right here on campus, undergraduates were denied tickets to the event. This was a total slap in the face to students. Why bother having the debate at UMass if students weren't going to be a part of it?

A few things confused me about the event.

Stupid thing number one: For the last few weeks there were people all around campus from groups such as MASSPIRG and SCERA who tried to get students registered to vote. They wanted you to have the power to voice your opinion, right? Then this debate rolled into town, and the Center for Public Policy told you to take a hike. That seemed contradictory. People said, "Here get interested in the political process, blah, blah, blah." Then when the political process came and camped in your backyard, you were shooed away.

Stupid thing number two: How the hell could Cellucci and Harshbarger come to UMass and not have talked about education reform and tuition cuts with students? There are 20,000 college kids living five minutes from where they debated. Since the issues affected all students, we would have to liked to have heard what's what straight from the horse's mouth. Not having allowed even a small number of undergraduates to this event was a big mistake. It made me think that the candidates really could care less about what we think.

As far as I am concerned if the candidates can't talk turkey with students about issues that we are a part of, then what they have to say is probably crap anyway. I'm glad to see that those who want to represent us will come into our house, invite their friends, and then proceed to swiftly kick our sorry butts out the door. Thank you very much for making students feel like they have a part in politics.

To the editor:

The candidates for Governor of Massachusetts had a debate in the Mullins Center VIP room on the campus of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. How many students were allowed to attend? None. Who's fault is that? The University's, from what I've heard.

Who's university is this? The students'. Don't forget it! A debate between two candidates for the position of Governor of the state was held at the largest public institution of higher learning in the state, and the people for whom that institution was created and whom that institution is supposed to serve were not invited? Sounds like a scandal to me.

But why should I care? Well, maybe because every September through October I hear the same crap about students and elections: hear from the professors and advisors, "Get out there and vote. Have a say in your education." People from various organizations sit at tables and spew statistics about the astonishingly low representation of students at the polls. We're told to take charge, make a difference, let our voices be heard, use our right to vote. Well, what good does my vote do if I don't know who I'm voting for, what he or she stands for, or if he or she will adequately represent me?

Most students whom I've talked to don't vote because they don't want to vote for someone they don't support. They don't want to choose between Rich White Guy #1 and Rich White Guy #2 as a sign outside the Mullins Center read, or they don't know how to educate themselves enough about the candidates to make a good decision.

Well, that night would have been the perfect chance to educate ourselves. But I was not given that chance. So I'm back to square one; desperately wanting a government which represents the ideas and values of its citizens but not having the first clue as to where to get good, honest, unbiased information about the candidates.

I hope the University gets a big kick in the ass for this little fiasco. As students we have a right to benefit from the events that take place here or to at least be formally represented. We pay for that right and we earn that right. If the University wants to have their own little private party with the candidates and a select few "important" people, fine. Don't do it on our turf if we're not going to be invited. It's disrespectful and it pisses me off.

And finally, don't promise twenty–five tickets to the students and then take them away because too many important people were interested. It's not polite or professional to make promises that you can't keep. We're not stupid. We know when we're being screwed.

A call for education reform

To the editor:

I recently endorsed Scott Harshbarger for Governor because, as chairman of the Board of Education (April 1992– January 1996), I concluded that his election as Governor is essential to getting our education reform movement back on track. Many in the press interpret politics as purely personal games and conflicts, and charged that I endorsed Mr. Harshbarger because Governor Weld failed to reappoint me at the end of my first term. Other journalists asked if I was seeking a position in the Harshbarger Administration.

Some of us, however, care more about policy than personalities and place progress over partnership. I proudly supported Bill Weld for Governor in 1990 and 1994, and he appointed me to the Board of Education because he and I agreed on the goals to achieve in the education reform movement led by the Massachusetts Business Alliance for Education, culminating in the Education Reform Act, adopted in June of 1993. That reform was approved through the cooperative effort of the Governor, the legislative leadership, and the Massachusetts business community. Together, we worked hard to implement that Act.

By late 1995, our Board of Education, in compliance with the Act, had adopted a Common Core of Learning, six of the eight curriculum frameworks, regulations increasing the amount of academic time for all students, performance standards for teachers and administrators, revised certification and recertification requirements for teachers, professional development standards, and had in place plans to continue to implement those and other aspects of the Education Reform Act.

However, in late 1995, the Weld–Cellucci Administration abruptly shifted gears and moved in a more conservative direction. On November 1, 1995, Mr. Cellucci, as primary author of the Downsizing Government Report, proposed that Massachusetts eliminate all teacher standards and requirements, as well as the Department of Education, and proposed that other steps to unravel the education reform movement. Fortunately, the Legislature rejected all of those proposals.

The Weld–Cellucci Administration has also failed to provide leadership for getting computers and technology into our classrooms. This is a major high–tech state, and much of the computer software used in schools comes from Massachusetts. But we rank roughly 44th in the nation in the use of computers and technology in our public schools. Under the Education Reform Act, we are spending billions of dollars on education, but this Administration has provided no leadership for those funds to go toward improved training and professional development for our teachers, or for computers and technology for our students and teachers.

Improving our schools requires more leadership and sharing of responsibility and less grandstanding and blame. Every time test results are released in Massachusetts, this Administration blames teachers or parents or students. But the "blame game" is not a substitute for leadership and hard work, and the Cellucci Administration has provided neither in the last three years.

Finally, our State Board of Education is ineffective. Whenever it looks at test results, it throws the blame around, as if it has no responsibility to provide leadership in education. This Board flip–flopped on requiring graduation equivalency exams of every senior before they could obtain a diploma, and now has flip–flopped in the standards that should be applicable to teacher exams. Leadership requires bringing people together to attain a common goal. Leadership does not consist of simple barking orders and yelling at people to do a better job.

I know and admire Bill Weld, Paul Cellucci, and Scott Harshbarger. On the issue of education, however, Massachusetts has a clear choice, and Scott Harshbarger is the clear choice if we want to implement the Education Reform Act. And if we are to make progress, Massachusetts simply must have a new Board of Education that emphasizes teaching and learning over grandstanding and bullying.

Shelter from the storm

It was raining when I woke up today. I knew it was going to rain because the weatherman told me so. And the girl down the hall said so too because she has a bad knee, and when you have a bad knee, I guess sometimes your knee tells you that it is going to rain.

It was raining today when I woke up. There were clouds in the sky last night, so I figured it would rain. But I went to bed anyhow, knowing that it was going to rain. And I woke up this morning to see rain falling from the sky and puddles on the ground.

It was raining when I woke up today. I knew it was raining even though the shades were drawn shut because I could hear the hissing of the drops hitting the ground. It wasn't one of those hard rains that hurts as the drops fall on your head, but one of those constant rains that makes you wonder when it is going to stop.

It was raining today when I got up, so I went into the bathroom to put some cold water on my face to help me wake up. And I went to class today, even though it was raining. And as I walked I felt the cold raindrops hitting my face to help me wake up. I woke up in class, and I knew it was raining because when I looked out the window, I saw the rain falling, hitting the plexiglass windows that trapped me in that room. But when I wasn't trapped anymore, it was still raining. So I walked in the cold back to my dorm, and walking back to my room once I was in the dorm, I could tell that it was still raining because there were footprints on the floor where people had walked, puddles that they had left behind from walking in out of the rain.

I went out onto the balcony because here they have balconies that you can walk on, and each balcony hangs over the one below it so you don't get wet in the rain. The cement floor of the balcony which was made by me or someone like me had cigarette butts on it, which were also made and destroyed by me or someone like me. The floor also had water on it. There must have been wind blowing the rain onto the balcony, leaving me no shelter from this storm.

There must have been wind blowing the rain onto the balcony, leaving me no shelter from this storm.

Mark Griffin

A girl saw me out there, getting hit by the rain under a cover of cement and came out to join me. She told me she saw me and couldn't let me stand in the rain by myself, smoking a cigarette. But the rain still hit me nonetheless. She was still dry. Looking out at the diagonal, wind blown rain in the bowl, the girl with the bad knee told me there would be people playing in the rain later on. I believed her. Wearing rain coats or trash bags on their heads would keep them dry while they played outside in the rain.

This reminded me of when I was a boy, seeing that it was raining out, asking my parents if I could go outside. Then running across the street to a puddle near where the cars drove by really fast, I would wait to get hit by a cascade of splash from the wheels of the car as it drove by.

The people inside the car were always dry, but the rain would hit them as they got out and walked or ran to their office buildings or homes. Waiting on the balcony for the rain to stop, some drops hit me on the head, even though there was a big cement cover above my head that was made to keep rain from hitting me.

The girl on the balcony told me she thought that it would be a mild winter because it had rained so much this summer. She figured that since there had been so much rain, that it would even off when winter came, leaving us with no snow. Although, it wouldn't be so bad if it snowed because we wouldn't have to shovel it. But we still might slip on the ice, I told her. She agreed, I thought that since it had rained so much this summer that it would rain just as much this winter, except in the form of snow. Then people would be playing outside only then in their snow pants and scarves and maybe trash bags on their heads to keep from getting wet.

It was raining when I woke up today. I could feel the drops hitting my face, and I could see them hitting the ground. But I made it stop. I put on my boots and tied the laces real tight to make sure that nothing could get in and nothing could get out. I put on my big blue hat and my big blue raincoat and went for a walk. It wasn't raining because the drops hit my umbrella and gaining momentum as they trickled down, they fell to my side. It was dark outside even though the sun hadn't set, but I found it peeking through a little hole in the clouds, right where heaven is supposed to be. And it was bright again.

Where are your manners?

As I sat in the Bluewall the other day enjoying my pre– class cuppa joe, I was suddenly bashed on the side of the head. The impact caused the coffee cup, which was on its way to my mouth, to tip over and spill its contents on my lap. With a throbbing head and a singed groin, I looked up, feebly trying to focus my eyes. When I finally did, I saw the retreating form of a person wearing a heavy backpack. They had smacked me upside the head getting out their seat, and without so much as an "I'm sorry"or "Excuse me" went on their way.

Now I know this person was aware that they had run into something. As any of my friends can tell you, I have a big ol' noggin. I can't even wear baseball hats because the adjustable straps are always too short. If I wasn't so tall, I'd look like a cartoon character; maybe the person who hit me thought they had run into a wall or something except for the fact that inanimate objects don't say "Oof" and then scream as they dump hot coffee on themselves. This person was definately aware that they had in fact hit a human being. The only explanation I can come up with is that the person who hit me is a rude bastard who deserves to be destroyed.

Patil Martinez

I mean, when did the most basic manners become passe? Now I'm not saying that I don't enjoy the occasional well–timed belch or armpit fart, but I also have a pretty fluid definition of manners. In general, though, many people have left simple politeness by the wayside.

Remember politeness? Remember holding the door for someone? Or saying, "Excuse me" and not having it mean "Get out of my way" or something sarcastic? Even simple phrases like "Please" and "Thank you" seem to have disappeared from our vocabulary.

Now I know most people reading this are saying, "I do those things, and most people I know are fairly courteous. What the heck are you talking about?" Hey, if you're one of those people who actually goes out of their way to make someone else's day a little better with a kind gesture, more power to you. However, in general, these people are few and far between. Most of us are too caught up in the rush of our daily lives to pay heed to the simple rules of social interaction, and maybe some of you have forgotten them entirely. Here's a simple checklist to help you out:

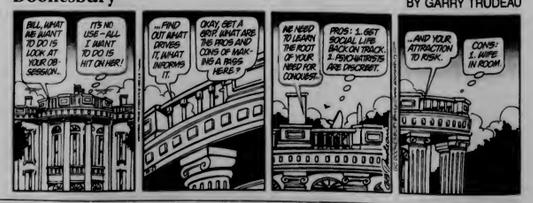
1. Hold the door. It's really easy. When someone is walking behind you, and their hands are full, simply extend your arm behind you after you go through the door. For the more advanced polite people, try letting someone go ahead of you as you hold the door for them. Also, if someone holds the door for you, say "Thanks."

2. Say "Please" and "Thank you." Sound it out a few times. Practice on your friends, and then move on to strangers when you feel ready.

3. When driving your car across campus, consider stopping for pedestrians and not acting as if they're committing a crime by crossing the street. However, if they fail to wave, feel free to tap them with your bumper.

4. Say "Bless you" when someone sneezes; also, when you sneeze or cough in class, cover your mouth. Nothing is quite as charming as feeling misty breeze from the seat behind you.

Now remember, these are just a few ground rules. Feel free to develop your own manners based on the examples above; you can even mix and match them to create new ones. Be careful, though. Saying "Bless you" after you bump someone with your car is not acceptable, although it may be funny. Be creative and use your imagination.



As we all know, there are people like the one who smacked me upside the head who are apparently hopeless. These people go through life acting rudely and obnoxiously to everyone else and basically making the nice people miserable. They are the ones who cut you off in traffic and clap when someone drops their tray in the DC. But as usual I have a solution. The next time you encounter one of these people, kill them.

Now, I know killing someone may actually seem a little rude, but think of it this way: by killing these thoughtless clods, you are actually being polite because you are preventing any future rude acts by that person. In this context, it becomes extraordinarily rude not to kill them, which creates a disturbing paradox in which you yourself would become impolite. The only well–mannered act in this situation is to kill yourself, or if this is against your religious convictions, to ask someone (politely) to do it for you.

Have a nice day.

Paul Martinez is a UMass student.

White identity: Beyond guilt

This January, as part of a training on diversity and multicultural mediation, I sat down with about twelve other white people and faced the question, "What does it mean to you to be white?"

Like many white people, I had never pondered the question at any length or spoken to anyone else about it. Now we had an hour to spend on the question: nothing else to do. So I joined in the conversation, even though I felt like what I had to say would be obvious to anyone, regardless of race. I feel guilty, I said. I'm aware that I have privileges, like knowing that I won't face racial discrimination in the job market. I feel guilty about this privilege, and I'm not sure what to do, except that I try to be sensitive about issues of race, and on those rare occasions when I find myself in a position of power, I make sure I don't discriminate. I don't fear people of color, and I don't take my guilt and internalize it into anger. But, I said, I don't feel empowered to turn my guilt into something useful.

The unfortunate by–product of feeling guilty, I added, is that I don't feel I have a culture worth being proud of. My ancestors owned slaves, massacred Native Americans by the thousands, and committed Japanese–Americans to internment camps in the 1940's. To be more exact, whether or not my ancestors were actually involved, I am a descendant of the European culture that defined these acts as "right." I felt somewhat expiated by this realization that my white skin gave me privilege but not pride. Part of me hoped it was enough.

Others in the group spoke up too. The comment that struck me most was from someone who said that when he walked into a class of forty white people, he would say to himself, "There are forty people in this class." But when he walked into a class of forty black people, he would say, "There are forty black people in this class." Being white is the norm; white people are just people, but black people are black people. This "norm" is subtle but powerful, and it's reinforced every day. (And, of course, it holds true for other social identities: being male, straight, able, middle–class.)

Since that conversation I've taken time to educate myself and search within myself to find what it means to be white. I've explored what "white privilege" means. I've learned about "DWB" — "Driving While Black" — a moving violation ranging from minor to major in many places in this country.

Henry Louis Gates Jr. recounts a story by William Julius Wilson of being stopped near a small New England town by a policeman who wanted to know "what he was doing in those parts."

Walking while black can be just as bad; then there was the "Eddie Bauer" case last year, where a department store security guard made a black teenager take off the shirt he was wearing and go home to get a receipt to prove he hadn't stolen the shirt.

These aren't rare occurrences, although it's rare that we hear about them in the mainstream press; and they didn't end after the civil rights movement. They happen every day, everywhere in this country.

As I have explored my racial identity, one guide along my way has been Peggy McIntosh, who wrote the article "White Privilege: Unpacking the Invisible Backpack." McIntosh lists numerous "items" in this invisible backpack: "I can go shopping alone most of the time, pretty well assured that I will not be followed or harassed... I can do well in a challenging situation without being called a credit to my race... I am never asked to speak for all the people of my racial group... I can criticize our government and talk about how much I fear its policies and behavior without being seen as a cultural outsider... If a traffic cop pulls me over or if the IRS audits my tax return, I can be sure I haven't been singled out because of my race."

Our personalities are informed by our pasts, and our pasts are informed by our race. To forget our differences is to deny the experiences of others.

Rob Fetter

Another guide has been my experience in Race Talks, an RSO at UMass dedicated to promoting awareness and discussion of racial issues on and off campus.

Last year Race Talks (which is a racially diverse group) held workshops in several residence halls and one high school; this year we will also begin to enter classrooms on campus.

I deeply enjoy the group, because it gives me a chance to educate others about issues of race at the same time as I learn from members of the group and from the people we present to.

In my experiences with Race Talks and elsewhere, and in searching myself and talking with other white people about what being white means, I have also moved beyond my guilt and my feeling of alienation from my heritage and culture. In the lingo of the social identity development theory, I had felt an "identity void."

Whereas nearly a year ago I said I didn't feel proud of my heritage, now I see that although my ancestors weren't the heroes that history sometimes makes them out to be, I have a lot to be proud of in my ancestry.

In the last year, too, I've been to more than one forum where a white person speaks hopefully and plaintively — and with good intentions — about how we should just forget our differences and realize that we're all people. I've also talked with several people of color and come to see that the idea of "forgetting our differences" is naive.

Our personalities are informed by our pasts, and our pasts are informed by our race. To forget our differences is to deny the experiences of others.

It is also to deny our own experience and identity — and as white people that may be tempting, but it's impossible.

Not only is it not possible, it's not very helpful.

We must come to see who we are and what our various social identities mean to us; we must understand and truly value our own experiences before we can work effectively to bridge differences.

Rob Fetter is a UMass student.

RACE

The greatest lie ever told!

This is part one of a four–part series.

When we play the "race game," we become that average high school runner who joins the track team because that's where all the extra–budda brothers floss for all the extra– tasty dips.

Let's call this person Brother Tyson. Bro. T has some natural ability and naturally has to run the Big–Dog event, the 100–yard dash. T does not train because he doesn't need to, because as T says, "Can't nobody see me."

His coach, the study–hall monitor, suggests that T run some sprints to work on his time. However, the coach knows that T's 15–second hundred is faster than he could ever run because he never ran track.

So, at the first meet against a small school, Suckers High, the team is late because they stopped at McDonald's to eat. Arriving twenty minutes late, the team has to forfeit the first two events. T jumps off the bus and walks up to the warm– up area with the slow playa playa stroll that he uses to call the people's attention on him. In the warm up area, T pulls out his new Nike "Honey Drippas" (the hottest shoe out) and spends the warm–up period putting in his triple–phat Day Glo laces. When he is finished, he lines up on the white line and waits for the start of the race.

After some time, T looks up and notices that he is the only runner at the white line. He then realizes that other runners are lined up at the yellow line on the other side of the field and furthermore, that the race had already begun.

T starts running across the field to get to the real starting line, but by the time he gets there, all the other runners are past the hundred–yard mark, but they keep running. T looks to his coach and his coach tells him, "I forgot to tell you that this is the State Finals and I signed you up for the marathon, but keep running because this is the final event, and the future of the entire team depends on you winning."

T's story is probably closer to the truth than fiction in how we approach life.

We have to ask ourselves in all seriousness, are our motivations to join and be a part of our "communities or groups" any less self–serving than T's motivation to join the team? Are our primary concerns tied up in social appearance any less than T's was to profile?

T's story is probably closer to the truth than fiction in how we approach life.

James E. Callahan

Do we attend to life any more closely than T did to his running? Do we prepare for our reality any more than T trained? Are our goals any more defined than T's? Is our plan for life any clearer than T's plan to run? Do we receive any more adequate instruction from our communities than T received from his coach?

Do we rely on the perspective that things will work out for us because of our own individual abilities any less than T relied on his average natural talent? Are we any more aware of the magnitude of the race, the level of competition, the sacrifice needed to achieve, the reliance of others on our performance, and of the importance of the race that we are made to run than T was?

T may not be unique, but what T is, is us!

Think about it and keep it real? Hotep — Peace.

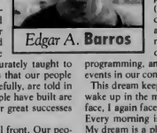
James E. Callahan III is a UMass graduate student.

Plight of a people
The dream of ONE nation

I have this dream that has been irking me for several years now. This dream has been reoccurring since my days at the Brockton YMCA when I was rocking my phat Malcolm X sneakers, an old NBA jersey, running up and down the court, always pretending there were two scouts watching me. This dream keeps coming back to me and won't let me rest. As I twist and turn at night trying to get some sleep, I can't help but wonder when this dream will become reality.

This bothersome dream is ONE of great unity: ONE of togetherness and family.

The dream depicts a world of ONE great Black Nation. In this dream all black people are united as one. We all unify under the common umbrella of blackness to preserve our well–being, our interests, and our children from the evil forces that be.



Within this great struggle for true unlimited liberation — liberation of the mind — we take control of our education. Our focus is one of global independence and progress. The triumphs of our people throughout history are properly and accurately taught to our children. The many migration routes that our people have travelled — willingly as well as forcefully, are told in full. Stories of great empires that our people have built are unveiled. Liberation movements and their great successes are retold in great detail.

Within this dream I also see ONE global front. Our people in the United States, our people in Central America, our people in South America, our people in Africa, our people everywhere, have joined for a common purpose: true independence and control of our destiny. An international organization has been formed, the Front for Independence Assurance (FIA). This organization is made up of delegates from black nations across the globe. This organization is backed by ONE military unit, and ONE strong financial foundation — similar to the United Nations, except this organization will insure the safety and freedom of every population of black folk around the world.

I can't wait to lay my head on my pillow again tonight. From 10:00pm to 8:30am every night, I live in a world of total independence and tranquility.

In this dream, trade networks are firmly established. Companies that are headed by our people network and establish trade agreements with each other, allowing each other preferential treatment. This helps promote economic growth within this ONE nation. Employment opportunities are plenty and companies owned by our people employ our people. These companies not only employ our people but they also promote our people to top management positions. The glass ceiling is shattered in this dream, in fact, it's non– existent.

This dream shows me a world where none of our people are homeless, hungry or sick. A state–of–the–art medical facility provides medical attention to all our people. Whether our patients are driven to this strategically centrally located medical facility, or whether they are flown to this facility, adequate medical treatment is available to our people.

Edgar A. Barros

Media power is very evident in this dream which came to me. Black people are not misrepresented and/or under–represented in this dream. Television stations are owned and operated by our people. Unlike puppet stations such as BET (Black Entertainment Channel), and various television stations in South America and Africa which promote and include mostly European–based programming, our television station provides quality programming, and effective reports and coverage of news events in our communities and around the globe.

This dream keeps haunting me in my sleep. As I abruptly wake up in the middle of the night with a big smile on my face, I again face the fact that I am back in the nightmare. Every morning is a nightmare, every day is a nightmare. My dream is a place of tranquility, a place of peace, and a place where I can just be me. In this dream my children do not have to worry about being a "black" person. They don't have to worry about surviving or "making it." College, a career, and success is the norm, not the exception.

This dream — this dream — this dream...

Does anybody else out there share this same dream?

I can't wait to lay my head on my pillow again tonight. From 10:00 p.m. to 8:30 a.m., I live in a world of total independence and tranquility. I am able to explore all aspects of my innermost wants, desires, thoughts, ideas, and plans. I live a life of total confidence.

Our ONE nation affords me access to a fair and efficient justice system. I rest assured that I have access to efficient, state–of–the–art medical treatment. I know that the education system which I attend is there to serve my best interests; I never have to worry about being a second–class citizen, and I know that my leaders are true leaders, not brainwashed puppets who are merely speaking the words and wishes of outside forces. The FIA assures me and my family that our freedom is never threatened.

Do you see it? Can you feel it?

I'm sorry about that last paragraph, I closed my eyes for a moment. I am back now.

This dream — this dream — this dream...

Does anyone out there share this same dream?

I have to go now — I am going to take a nap.

Please don't wake me up.

The Black Student Union

The Black Student Union, commonly referred to as the BSU, is a Registered Student Organization (RSO) at UMass Amherst. Their goal is to represent the individual and collective political, educational, and social concerns of Black students on campus. The primary function of the BSU is to be a powerful support mechanism for the development and advancement of Black students through researching and providing resources and networks to faculty, staff, and administration. The BSU also serves as a second family to those who are looking for a comfortable social atmosphere.

I'm sure there are questions like: "Who is the BSU for?" and "If I'm not Black, can I still get involved?" The BSU is for ALL people of African descent and/ or those who identify with the African Diaspora. The Diaspora represents all peoples whose roots originate from Africa, which in some way, shape, or form includes all minority groups. Included in this diverse array of people are numerous ethnic, groups, cultures, and religions that have their roots within the scope of the Diaspora. Therefore, the color of a person's skin is not the deciding factor as to who belongs. We must all realize that all members of the ALANA community share a common origin. The issue of the "Diaspora" is just one of many subjects that the BSU attempts to define, debate, and educate people about.

Reggie Price

The BSU concept came to fruition in 1992. After just a few chaotic rebuilding years, BSU has become one of the most widely recognized and powerful RSO's at UMass. Last year's instrumental restructuring of the organization was led by President LaKeisha Nicole Kennedy, Vice President Jeff Bellziare, Treasurer Stephanie Hope, Assist Treasurer Jaime "Shaggy" Flores, Secretary Odele Faly, Assist Secretary Lamar Baptist, and Public Relations Patrice Taylor. These leaders worked to pave the way for students to learn and participate in the future. They worked to rectify their constitution, established a comfortable office environment, strengthened ties with other ALANA RSO's, and created some of the most unique programming in the Pioneer Valley.

"Voices for the Voiceless" is the most successful program put together by any RSO to bring the whole five–college community together. "Voices" is a poetry reading by the best Black and Latino poets in the country. Due to the undisputed reputation of the BSU, Attallah Shabazz, almost immediately after the untimely death of her mother, Dr. Betty Shabazz, made her only public appearance here, at her mother's alma mater. The BSU also commissioned TAT's Crew to do the Diaspora Mural ", which is hanging in the Campus Center, in memory of Ennis Cosby, the late son of Bill Cosby.

This Friday, the BSU will be holding a public ceremony in the Campus Center at 4 p.m. to dedicate a second mural in honor of Dr. Betty Shabazz. Some of the BSU's other events include diverse educational and political themes, discussions, and which promote overall unity. This past Friday, the BSU kicked off a discussion series for men and women of color which was inspired by "One Time For the Mind," a column series written by Allana E. Todman. This series and others are designed to strengthen our communities and to promote dialogue.

The BSU is now on an upward movement and has many opportunities for individuals to share their talents, ideas and experiences for the continual growth of the BSU. Anyone who wants to get involved is welcome. The general body meetings are held every other Monday, and the BSU office in 407 Student Union, and is open during the day from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Reggie Price is a UMass student.

Giant tricks in Big Apple

By Kevin Monahan

THEY MIGHT BE GIANTS
Bowery Ballroom
Oct. 16

NEW YORK — "We met in the springtime at a rock and roll show/It was on the Bowery, then it was time to go..."Cause everyone's your friend in New York City/and everything looks beautiful when you're young and pretty/the streets are paved with diamonds, and there's just so much to see/but the best thing about New York City is you and me."

As They Might Be Giants rattled off the list of familiar settings on their cover of "New York City" (as it appears on the Factory Showroom album), the first song performed Friday night, I realized those aren't diamonds — that's glass.

Playing to a hometown crowd (well, sort of...) for a three night stint at the Bowery seemed a more intimate setting for the duo of John Linnell and John Flansburgh. "Hi, we're They Might Be Giants from Brooklyn, New York," (they're really from Lincoln, Massachusetts — hence the title of their second album) exclaimed Flansburgh to the sold-out crowd before Linnell launched into "They Might Be Giants" from their 1990 album Flood.

The Giants were promoting their latest release, Severe Tire Damage. Their live setting offered almost everything that the live album was sorely lacking. The microphone-on-a- stick, confetti cannon, and severed puppet heads (sorry, no conga lines) are great prop pieces, despite the fact that their shtick might be getting a little old and tired by now.

"Ana Ng" was an early favorite that struck a chord with the audience, as was "Istanbul (Not Constantinople)," a cover of The Four Lads' 1951 song. The confetti cannon used during "James K Polk," Linnell explained, was not a big hit in the South. "I was going to mention something about the Civil War, before realizing that it was completely inappropriate. So, I just stood there with my mouth open, then we went into the next song."

Drummer Dan Hickey was allowed to showcase his talents on the glockenspiel, and the horn section was a welcome addition — proving to be invaluable on songs like "She's Actual Size" and "The Guitar." "S-E-X-X-Y" was also a vehicle for the horns and the rhythm section with it's 70's porn-music sound. "Particle Man" and "Mammal" were also performed.

They managed to cleverly plug Severe Tire Damage, their first release on their new label Restless Records, without ever mentioning the title of the album. "This is a song off our new album...off our brand-new album. So don't be fooled by all those other albums," said Flansburgh before closing with "Birdhouse In Your Soul."

Their encore consisted of the funniest ventriloquism featured in rock concerts today with "Exquisite Dead Guy," and a song "about a worm who thinks he's a doctor," one of a few studio tracks on Severe Tire Damage, "Doctor Worm."

Yes, everyone wishes they'd play "Don't Let's Start" again, but some of us (myself included) have to accept the fact that they will never play that live again. A few new tricks couldn't hurt. All in due time, though. We haven't gotten bored with the old ones quite yet.

"Hospital" heat steams up soaps; "Y&R" revelation

Hi, soap fans. Wasn't it fab having last Monday off? God knows we could all use a break and for moi, it was the perfect opportunity to catch up on the few soaps that I've been unable to watch due to conflicts of interest. You know, the four o'clock class that I never attend, and such. How proud my parents would be to know that I skip class just so I can watch the last fifteen minutes of "General Hospital."

Enough idle chat, let's get down to the business at hand. A lot has happened since we last spoke, including the moment that "GH" fans have been clamoring for. Last week, Laura and Stefan gave in to their feelings for one another and shared a steamy kiss. I'm not talking about a quick peck, either.

Laura came to the island with the intention of spending some quality time with Nikolas. Nik, however, didn't show, (he was too busy playing dress up with Liz, Lucky and Emily) leaving Stefan with the perfect opportunity to confront Laura about whatever's been going on between the two of them. They became swept up in the past, exchanged a few lingering looks and before you knew it, boom, they were locked in a passionate embrace. The whole thing was very romantic. You're probably thinking, "Hello! What about Luke?" but I think it's completely within character for her to seek comfort in the arms of another man, especially a hottie like Stefan who lavishes her with attention. I mean, her son has practically disowned her, her husband has left the country without telling her when or if he'll be returning, and let's not forget Bobbie, who ranks on her constantly. Every week the witch drops by to tell her what a lousy wife and mother she is.

Anyway, I absolutely adore Stefan and Laura. I'm not calling for an end to Luke and Laura here, but I'd at least like to see them toy with the idea of a Stefan/Laura tryst. Love 'em or hate 'em, you have to admit the chemistry between them is truly enchanting (as were Stefan's "virginal white" duds. The spandex shirt he wore during last Friday's flashback sequence was ... well, yummy.)

The week's other big to-do involved Sharon ("The Young & the Restless") finally finding out about Grace and Nick's sleazy one-night stand. Poor Sharon, as if the woman hasn't been through enough this past year. And as for Grace, what a witch. I don't care how wacko she is, you don't skank your best friend's man (what happened to sisterhood?). It's not like she doesn't have her fair share of men. I mean, she's got the hottest thing on two legs, Tony, fawning all over her but of course that's not enough for Queen Gracie. Look for this revelation to cause a huge rift, obviously, between Nick and Sharon. You can bet Grace will be there, hovering like the vulture that she is, just waiting to pick up the pieces.

Of course I can't forget the "little soap that could," "Port Charles." Last week, Kevin walked in on a romantic liason between Lucy and Scott. All I can say is, it's about time. Was I supposed to believe that there were no residual feelings or chemistry between the two, given their long and complicated history together? Finally, a year after the show's conception, the writers have decided to delve into the Kevin/Lucy/Scott triangle. Bravo! The only thing that irks me is how easily Scott seems to have forgotten about his most recent flame, Eve. Don't buy it! I have to admit though, it's good to see Scott and Lucy together again. The old-school "GH" fan, as much as I love Kevin and Lucy, is kind of hoping Lucy and Scott pull through this.

Industry News:

— Fiona Hutchinson (Jenna, "Guiding Light") has confirmed reports that she is indeed leaving the show. The news doesn't surprise me, given the fact that her character has been reduced to wallpaper these past few months. Apparently the actress asked to be let go from her contract early. Let's hope "GL"'s loss will be "One Life to Live"'s gain. The actress has mentioned her love for the once-great Gabrielle. I'll keep you posted.

— I just got a tip that Sarah Webber may be on her way back to "GH." The show also has plans to add three new characters to the canvas.

What to expect from next week's shows:

— "Another World": Matt and Cass find themselves in a race against time to save Lila and her baby.

— "Sunset Beach": Maria and Ben are found in a compromising position. Annie is forced to join Olivia in her scheme to break up Caitlin and Cole.

— "Y&R": Diane calls Victor's bluff. Katherine faces the "heat" in court. Phyllis schemes to get Michael back.

— "FC": Scott takes the witness stand. The verdict in Julie's trial is in.

— "GL": Ross gives Blake a second chance (once a fool, always a fool) Blake and Dinah reach an interesting agreement.

— "OLTL": (which has been incredible lately) Todd and Tea share a romantic evening. Todd is found ... Jessica calls it quits with Christian. I can't believe my darling Jess is pregnant. What is the world coming to?

— "GH": Lucky and Nik apparently make a shocking discovery at Wyndamere (I bet you they catch Laura and Stefan in the act). Monica gives Katherine the boot. Carly plots to get Jason back.

Our Guys delivers with probing insight

By Mike Messaros

OUR GUYS
Bernard Lefkowitz
Vintage

One of the scariest things in the world is reading about characters who do awful, unspeakable things — and then realizing you've known them.

In Bernard Lefkowitz's Our Guys, the author presents us with such an intimate portrait of middle/upper class suburbia and jock culture in high school, you can't help but think "I've been there." Reading about the characters in this book, I didn't feel separated from the people, but I felt like I dealt with them every day. I've ridden in cars with them; I've had classes with them. My high school had a motto: "Boys will be boys, but LaSalle boys will be gentlemen." But we were rarely gentlemen, because I doubt gentlemen, by definition, beat up kids who were supposedly "fags", or slashed the tires of the arty kids.

Our Guys follows a 1989 incident in Glen Ridge, an idyllic Northern New Jersey town, where a group of high school athletes raped a retarded girl. But the story is not that succinct. Lefkowitz moves backwards and forwards deftly, tracing the roots of the crime and the after-effects as well. The romance of Friday night lights and homecoming games is punctured by a look into the inherent seediness surrounding the athletes involved.

Lefkowitz places the blame squarely on a community that not only promotes a jock mentality, but also reinforces ancient male and female gender roles. The community and school operated under a system of complicity that allowed these kids to think of themselves as better than others. At one point, Lefkowitz describes school awards ceremonies where academic awards were hastily handed out, while the athletic awards took so long the ceremony was extended into the next day. These kids were made into heroes, invincible because of their skills. But the author wastes no time giving us the punchline: they weren't even good. The football team had losing records in the years these kids were juniors and seniors.

The book then traces the trial that ensues after Leslie Faber, the victim, finally tells people what happened. The male/female stereotypes seep into the trial, as some of the defense lawyers, especially the snaky Michael Querques, take to demeaning Leslie and the NOW supporters who show up at the trial to protest. During the trial, the defendants still relax behind a shield of invincibility, smirking and chuckling during some of the proceedings.

Amid all of the testosterone lies the victim, Leslie Faber (her name was changed, along with many other characters, in the book). She is presented with complexity, an easily manipulated girl caught up, time and time again, in something that is too large for her understanding. First, she's invited to a party where she becomes the main focus, putting on a display for the roomful of athletes. Then she becomes the focus of the defense case in the rape trial, wherein her sexual past becomes the prime focus at points. Leslie becomes an unwitting mark for anyone who wants to use her; all she wants are friends, and will do anything to get some. Easily manipulated, she readily changes her testimony and always refers to the defendants as "sweet guys." In her mental state she does not understand right and wrong, only that she wants to make everyone happy. In that way, she becomes a frustrating character, switching allegiances as she tries to win favor with both sides.

If anything hurts the novel, it's the fact that Lefkowitz, while obviously wanting to report journalistically and in an unbiased manner (he removes himself to from the story, never using I; if he's ever involved in the proceedings, he refers to himself as "the author), has drawn his own conclusions. And he wants you to understand it the way he does. He reports the rape incident from a viewpoint sympathetic to Leslie, but it is obvious from the conflicting testimonies and Leslie's own ever-changing story, that we don't know exactly what happened.

As you read this, as it relates the incidents of the jocks exposing themselves and treating women as their playthings, you realize that you went to school with these kids, that you maybe hated them, or laughed at their indifference to the world. Most of all, this book frighteningly implicates all of us in these crimes for supporting the stupidity that led to this. The old cliche: It could happen anywhere becomes fully realized in the text, as Lefkowitz exposes the roots of one town's jock mentality. The chain of events which allowed this to happen stretched back for generations, and involved parents, educators, friends, authorities — everyone. It makes you realize that until things change, there will be more incidents like this. Lefkowitz reels off an amazing statistic that 40 percent of females believe that some women "ask for it," by going to that frat party, or wearing that dress. It's that attitude of complicity, of laissez-faire, of "boys will be boys" that allows people from Glen Ridge, or from anywhere, to smile and chuckle while on trial for rape. A

Capitals bury Lightning in NHL action Sunday

TAMPA, Fla. (AP) — Peter Bondra scored his 23rd career goal in 26 games against Tampa Bay as the Washington Capitals beat the Lightning 4-1 yesterday night.

Bondra gave the Capitals a 2-0 lead by redirecting Dmitri Mironov's centering pass at 18:15 of the second period of the game.

Earlier, Washington center Joe Juneau scored his 100th career goal on a slap shot from just inside the blue line at 4:10 of the first period, putting the Capitals up 1-0 on Tampa Bay.

Matthew Herr and Jaroslav Svejkovsky added third-period goals for Washington (2-1-1).

Mikael Andersson had the Tampa Bay goal. The Lightning (0-4-1) remained winless in their past 15 games, dating back to March 30.

The announced crowd of 7,715 was the smallest in the Tampa Bay franchise's history. The previous low was 8,062 set Nov. 17, 1992 when the Lightning hosted Winnipeg at the Florida State Fairgrounds Expo Hall.

Washington left wing Chris Simon, who was sent home following a spat last Tuesday with coach Ron Wilson, returned after missing one game.

The Lightning will be without Stephane Richer for at least two weeks. The right wing will undergo arthroscopic surgery on his ailing left ankle this week.

Jets versus Pats

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Regrets? Curtis Martin says he has none about leaving New England for the New York Jets. Neither should the Patriots, who replaced him with outstanding rookie Robert Edwards. They'll play on the same field for the first time before a Monday night crowd inflamed by the growing rivalry between the AFC East enemies. And, for one game, those fans will be excited by a head-to-head competition between two top running backs.

"I look forward to every game, but this is a game you get pumped up for," Martin said.

After making the Pro Bowl in two of his three seasons, he left last March as an unrestricted free agent. Edwards was drafted with the 18th pick, one of two compensatory choices the Patriots received for losing Martin.

"It's something that I don't regret," Martin said. "I hope the Patriots don't regret it. I'm sure they don't."

Why should they?

Edwards is one of three running backs in NFL history to rush for a touchdown in each of his first five games, joining Alan Ameche (1955) and Joe Cribbs (1980). He's rushed for 92, 97 and 104 yards in his last three games.

"He looks good to me," said lets coach Bill Parcells, whose move from New England to New York for the 1997 season created the heated rivalry.

Having succeded Herschel Walker, Rodney Hampton, Garrison Hearst and Terrell Davis as a running back at Georgia, Edwards doesn't feel pressure in taking over for Martin.

"I can only come in and do what I can do," he said. "I can't do anything that he did, or attempt to, because I'm my own player. He's his own player."

So far, the numbers are close: Edwards has outgained Martin 379 yards to 368, but has played one more game. He also leads in touchdowns, 6-1, and average yards per carry, 4.3-3.5, but Martin has a 16-7 edge in receptions.

Huskies crept back into the game, never letting up as the Minutemen continued to put numbers on the scoreboard. When Massachusetts kicker Matt Murphy missed a 35 yard field goal with eleven seconds to go to allow overtime, the UConn 30-point second half was vindicated.

Overtime was the last boost that the Huskies needed, as Jim McManus put the game-winner through the uprights on UConn's first and only possession of the extra frame.

From here on out, the pressure is on the Minutemen. Next week they'll take on offensive powerhouse Villanova for homecoming.

"Now we'll find out what kind of football team we are," Whipple said. "Teams respond when you get some kind of adversity. Great teams really respond you get a lot of adversity, like Connecticut did today, like we have in he past."

before the break as J.R. Pouncey scored his first goal as a Minuteman at 49:18.

The Minutemen struck first in the second half as James Redmond netted his first goal of the season to cut the deficit to 3-2.

"That was a huge goal for me and the team," Redmond said. We were really energized after that, and felt like we had a shot at taking the game."

UMass played well in the second frame but a bad sequence toward the end of the game eventually did them in.

At 79:00, UMass was called for a foul that led to a Xavier penalty kick. Jake Brodsky was called for a takedown, giving Rob Bakker a chance at an insurance goal.

Bakker calmly booted the ball to the left of the goal as Fowler was heading to the right to temporarily deflate the UMass attack.

UMass countered with pressure down the stretch including two golden opportunities for Adam Black.

The first came on a penalty kick for Black with six minutes remaining in the game. Black fired the ball right at Xavier keeper Paul Wessling who cradled the ball for the save.

Only one minute later, Black just missed an open net as Wesseling came out to defend. The ball trickled to the right of the goal, which proved to be the last great chance for a UMass goal.

The Dayton game proved to be another letdown, as Emmanuel Ayim scored the lone goal at 68:45 assisted by Tim Petterson for the win.

Fowler was exceptional in net, as he made five saves in the loss.

■ madness

"[Because of] the schedule that we have, and the teams that are coming here to play, a lot of people come up and question as and ask us 'are the games going to be exciting this year,' and I say [to them] that 'you've got to come and show your support,'" said Clark, who feels that he and his teammates are a crucial part of Flint's plan to generate more excitement. "They've been very interested in the posters we have, and a lot of people want to come and support us. We're just trying to keep [ourselves] open, and the fans with us."

Following a team introduction which featured everything from fireworks to an R.O.T.C. cadet repelling from the rafters, junior small forward Mike Babul capitalized on the opportunity to notch his third consecutive slam dunk contests title. Although sophomore transfer Shannon Crooks dazzled the crowd with his shirt-removing dunk, Babul was greeted by a louder ovation after leaping and dunking over teammates Rafael Cruz and Darryl Denson.

Clarke and sophomore guard Jonathan Depina shared 3- point shooting honors after both connecting on eight of fifteen shots. Although the three-point contest and scrimmage did not create the same excitement surrounding the team introduction and slam dunk competition, Clarke feels that the entire Midnight Madness program is an important first step in the UMass climb back to national stardom.

"This is something to get the school involved and get ourselves involved," he said. "[We] just [want] to start the season off on the right foot."

game. To be down one goal against the No. 4 team in the country at their barn, going into the third period with a chance to win is good, but it's not good enough," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "We come out here to win, not just play well."

The game was still very much in doubt heading into the final minutes, thanks mainly in part to the stellar effort between the pipes by sophomore netminder Markus Helanen. The Vantaa, Finland native came up big on several occasions on point blank Spartan shots.

"They're definitely better than a second place team," said MSU Coach Ron Mason in regards to UMass' preseason predicted finish in Hockey East. "I thought their goalie was solid, and overall I was impressed with their team."

Michigan State finally put the game away at the 15:58 mark of the third period. With Minutemen Nathan Sell and Nick Stephens in the penalty box, the Spartans capitalized on a 5-on-3 power play, when All-American Mike York blistered a slap shot right under the cross bar.

"You've got to deal with 5-on-3 situations," Mallen said. "I think R.J. Bates lost his stick when they scored that goal, and that makes it even tougher, but that's a place where a good team wins a game."

The Spartans (1-0-1, 0-0-1, CCHA) opened the scoring 7:58 into the opening frame, when MSU freshman Shawn Mather tallied his first collegiate goal on a whistler from the right circle, rough the five-hole of Spartan.

es on offense for their own problems. In UConn's three scoring drives, the defense did not have much time to rest themselves on the bench, as the offense never stayed on the field for more than two minutes. In addition, the Huskies won the field position battle, as all three drives began in UMass territory.

"In the end, they found a way to get it done and we didn't," coach Mark Whipple said, "and that's why they're smiling and we're not."

UMass Women's Hoops Tryouts!

Walk–on tryouts will be held on October 22, 1998 at the Curry Hicks Cage between 6:00 and 8:00 p.m. Proof of insurance and proof of recent physical is needed before anyone can tryout. Also: The team is looking for managers for the 1998–99 season. For more information on either subject, call Craig Dagan at (413) 545–2726.

UMass field hockey creeps up on A–10 tourney placement

Massachusetts field hockey coach Patty Shea has always stressed the importance of taking care of conference games. Only the top four teams in the Atlantic 10 advance to the conference tournament, and from there, only the tourney winner moves on to the NCAA tournament.

The Minutewomen moved closer to their goal of taking care of their conference with a 4–1 victory over Temple in Philadelphia Saturday.

With the win, UMass (8-5, 3-0) secures a berth to the Atlantic 10 tournament. The Owls, meanwhile, will have to fight for a postseason spot after watching their record fall to 2-14, 0-3 in conference.

The Minutewomen relied on their penalty corner unit to do the most damage and they were not disappointed. All four UMass goals were scored on corner strikes, with freshman back Anke Bruemmer notching a pair.

UMass got on the board first, when senior midfielder Kate Putnam connected on a corner three minutes into the game. Temple evened the game at 1–1 on a Torie Russell goal just over 14 minutes into the contest.

Bruemmer took over on the next two corners, icing the game and adding a little insurance over the Owls.

Senior forward Erica Johnston increased the UMass edge to 4–1 late in the game by adding to the Minutewoman corner success.

Senior Vicky Browne and sophomore Patty Robinson were credited with assists on each of UMass' four goals. Browne hits out from the baseline, while Robinson is responsible for stopping the ball on the circle.

The Minutewomen will play conference foe St. Joseph's today at 11 a.m. in Philadelphia, before rounding out the Atlantic 10 regular season with a contest at Rhode Island on Thursday.

MSU defeats UM

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

EAST LANSING, Mich. — Massachusetts hockey goalie Markus Helanen entered Saturday night's matchup with only eight career collegiate starts. No. 4 Michigan State would be number nine for the sophomore goalkeeper.

Helanen's task grew, as the band was rocking at Munn Arena, for he was to face several All-American candidates, like MSU captain Mike York, assistant captain Bryan Adams, and defensemen Jeff Kozakowski and Andrew Hutchinson.

"We give those guys a lot of credit, but we did give them a lot of off–angle shots," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "Mike York and Bryan Adams are quality players."

The first period was tightly contested, with the shots being evenly split, 10–9 in favor of Michigan State. From there, UMass gradually slipped throughout the game, being outshot 7–4 in the second period, and 17–4 in the third.

The UMass fall–off in the third was almost a direct result of their struggles with penalties. They had seven penalties for 14 minutes and a total of eight power–play minutes for MSU.

In the third period, UMass was also called for five penalties which totalled eight minutes and a two man advantage.

The result was two power play goals for the Spartans; by Damon Whitten at 7:58 of the first period, and a goal by York at 15:35 of the third.

"The power plays definitely hurt us. We had a couple of soft calls. We've just got to be more disciplined, and stop taking soft penalties," Helanen said.

"There were a couple of soft calls, and I just wish it had been called consistently with the rest of the game," Mallen said.

The star of the game for UMass was Helanen. The netminder made 31 saves, despite letting in three goals. The score was close, and the reason was Helanen.

In clutch–time, Helanen made 16 saves in the third period to keep UMass in the game 2–1. The eventual icing goal for MSU had to be scored when the Spartans had a five–on–three advantage.

"I thought their goalie was very solid, and was overall impressed with their team," said MSU Coach, Ron Mason, the all–time winningest coach in collegiate hockey history.

It seemed that every five minutes Michigan State players were being set up in front of the net MSU players such as York Adams, Joee Goodenow and Rustyn Dolyny.

Opportunities also arose for MSU defenders on the power plays, as defenders like Kozakowski, Hutchinson, and Brady Brandstatter all got off several shots which were easily turned aside by Helanen with a patented kick–save or an easy glover.

The MSU pressure and the UMass penalties were the final story of the game. The third period was dominated by the Spartans, but if not for Helanen's two great glove saves on York pad saves on Brandstatter, and one kick–out on Dolyny, among others, the damage would have been much worse.

The final was 3–1, but Helanen kept it close to give his team a chance.

"We played tight with the No. 4 team in the nation. We need to find a way to win these close games," Mallen said.

"Markus Helanen played pretty well. He is in a position where he is only going to get better, and this game will give him the confidence he needs to be a quality goalie."

Midnight Madness lights up campus

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

When Massachusetts men's basketball coach Bruiser Flint jogged onto the court after his name was called during the Midnight Madness rally on Friday night, he had his first opportunity to see whether or not his new plan for the 1998– 1999 season would work.

In years past, he usually expected to see somewhere between six to seven thousand people packed into the Williams D. Mullins Center. After numerous appearances across campus to boost student involvement, the third-year coach was able to smile a bit while addressing the enormous Midnight Madness crowd — a crowd which indicated his plan's success by nearly filling the entire Mullins Center.

"This is great. It's just great," Flint said while addressing what he classified as the top Midnight Madness fan turnout he has seen in his tenure as both assistant and head coach. "This is the best crowd we've ever had at Midnight Madness."

Even senior center and All-American candidate Lari Ketner, who seemed unexcited before partaking in his third dose of the Midnight Madness activities, was energized by the end result of his coach's plan, which culminated with over 8,000 fans chanting his name before he was introduced to them.

Although many people have suggested to Flint that he and his team should hold Midnight Madness in the much smaller Curry Hick's Cage, the Philadelphia native refused to make the move, which would turn away thousands of fans to create the illusion of a sold–out arena.

"Our midnight madness is probably bigger than most people's, except for Kentucky," he said. "The first time we did it in the Mullins Center we had 7,000 to 8,000 [fans]. I remember watching some of the other ones they did on T.V. after that, and they had it in their auxiliary gyms for like 2,000 people. So, it looked packed... we get a nice six to seven thousand people every time we run midnight madness."

As the consummate Minuteman competitor, senior guard Charlton Clarke ensured that his teammates would match the intensity of the fans during the 10–minute scrimmage. At one point, Clarke challenged second–year guard Monty Mack to shoot the ball from six feet behind the three–point line. After a second of deliberation, Mack connected on the long shot, much to the delight of Clarke, who has been outspoken about the importance of intensity offered by both fans and players.

UMass football loses thriller to archrival UConn

By Seth Koenig

STORRS, Conn. — "I would've felt good if he hit the field goal, but I would've felt the same way I did last week, which is not good." Horseshoes and hand grenades.

If the Massachusetts football team had played their archrivals, the Connecticut Huskies, with either of these things, they would've been fine.

But they were playing football, and thus, regardless of the fact that they racked up 510 total yards and led by at least a touchdown throughout almost the entire game, the unfavorable 44–41 score that ended up on the board will show up as a loss in the statistics.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Marcel Shipp

"The bottom line is I just have to give credit to UConn," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said.

"A lot of good athletes and a lot of good plays, but we just came up on the short end."

Another fantastic performance out of Marcel Shipp, who ran for 189 yards and a score, wasn't enough. Jimmy Moore's eight catch, 151 yard, four touchdown record–breaking game didn't quite do the trick, either. No Minuteman could look back on their showing and be terribly unhappy, and nobody seemed to be able to point out exactly why the squad came up short, but nonetheless, UConn was victorious.

When UMass quarterback Todd Bankhead threw a sideline interception to Jordan Younger on the only Massachusetts possession of the overtime period, not long after UConn tailback Recolon Jumpp's two yard touchdown burst finally brought the long–trailing Huskies level with the Minuteman with 3:09 to go in the contest, all the pain of playing for three and a half hours turned to the numbness of shock.

"When you have a chance to put people away, you've got to do it," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said. "Especially when you're on someone else's turf."

We felt good going into overtime, especially after holding them to only a field goal. But their kid, Younger, made a great play on the interception. It was a bad call on my part, and UConn came out with a three–point win."

The Minutemen began the scoring in the first quarter, with two Bankhead to Moore touchdown connections. As the first half pressed on, Connecticut and Massachusetts exchanged two more scores, to go into halftime with UMass up 27–14.

When the kickoff of the third quarter came around, the defenses had left the building. UConn redshirt sophomore signal–caller Brian Hoffman, who had stepped in to start in place of All–American candidate Shane Stafford and was looked at as a possible weak link in the Husky offense, shredded the Minuteman defense for a Connecticut record of 413 yards and four touchdowns. In reply, Bankhead moved into second place in UMass history with his 19th TD pass of the season.

The Huskies answered the Massachusetts offensive numbers with 549 yards of their own. Receivers John Fitzsimmons and Carl Bond both hauled in six catches and over 100 yards apiece, making several difficult, balancing sideline catches when their club needed it most. In comparison, Moore and his UMass mates, despite catching four scoring passes, never seemed to get that crisp step.

Slowly, but surely, the dedicated

UConn's Hoffman comes through in clutch

By Brett Mauser

STORRS, Conn. — To Brian Hoffman, he could not have written a better story. Minutes after going the distance in defeating the Massachusetts football team 44–41, the sophomore quarterback, in his first career start for the Connecticut Huskies, stopped, and then corrected himself.

"Actually, I could've, I would've minused the two picks from that," Hoffman said.

But realistically, he couldn't have. After picking up where injured quarterback Shane Stafford left off in last week's victory over Hofstra, sentimentally, he wanted to make an impression on coach Skip Holtz in his first start.

And if it weren't for those two picks...

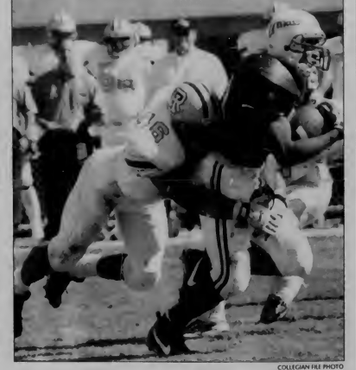
The Orlando, Fla. native single–handedly picked apart the UMass secondary piece by piece, and before he knew it, the defensive backfield was seemingly empty, becoming a game of toss with his friends in the backyard.

In compiling a UConn record 413 yards passing to go along with four touchdown passes, Hoffman could not have dreamt up a better afternoon. And neither could James Madison's Greg Maddox. Or Buffalo's Chad Salisbury. Or....

It's a scary thought, going into next week's clash with Villanova on Homecoming Weekend in Amherst. The Wildcats' Chris Boden threw for 276 yards before halftime even rolled around last year. Boden is back, and this time, he could use a confidence booster after two consecutive losses.

The second half was Hoffman's paradise, throwing for three of his touchdowns in the frame, allowing the Huskies to crawl their way back into the game.

"The receivers were running great routes and when they're open, you just have to put it on them," Hoffman said. "It wasn't like I did anything special."



Mr. Hoffman, Storrs thought you were quite special in valiantly replacing Stafford. True, if Stafford returns before time runs out on the season, yes, you will most likely return to the bench, but coach Holtz now knows his second stringer might be able to lead his team to a thrilling victory over the only undefeated team in the conference some other time.

That other time will come.

Now the question arises for the UMass defensive coaching staff. Where do we go now?

The Minuteman defense could credit spot laps-

CINCINNATI — Talk about a tough pill to swallow.

For a squad that has had to deal with adversity all season in too many ways, shapes and forms to even list, the Massachusetts women's soccer team deserved to beat Xavier in Friday night's game at Corcoran Field in Cincinnati.

Plain and simple. But sometimes stories don't have happy endings, and the Minutewomen found that out the hard way. Annette Gruber's second goal of the game, just 1:57 into overtime gave the Musketeers a 3–2 win over UMass.

"Personally, I feel that we outplayed Xavier and dominated them at times," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. The Minutewomen (6–9, 3–3 in the Atlantic 10) rallied back from a 1–0 halftime deficit by playing their most entertaining 45 minutes of the year in the second stanza. Emma Kurowski knotted the game at 1–1 less than five minutes into the half, when she tucked home the rebound of a Sophie Lecot header into an empty net.

Xavier (6–5–1, 4–1–1) then jumped right back on top a little more than two minutes later. Gruber knocked a free kick down in the box and put a shot past UMass keeper Cori Stevens for a 2–1 Musketeer lead.

The seesaw battle continued five minutes later, when Kurowski's turn–around blast from just inside the box found the back of the net and evened the game again with 33:33 left to play.

The hosts opened the scoring a little over 10 minutes into the game, as Megan Hasty lifted a shot over the top of Stevens for a 1–0 lead. "At this point I can't take things hard," Rudy said. Sitting at 6–9, 3–3 in the conference after the tough loss, UMass found itself in a tricky predicament heading into yesterday's date with first–place Dayton.

The Minutewomen needed to get at least one win out of the weekend road trip before heading down the home stretch.

The Minutewomen will next be in action Friday when they face Lasalle at home when co–captains Thompson and Lecot are honored.

Men's soccer loses two close ones

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Totman Field faithful have yet to be treated to a win by the Massachusetts men's soccer team as they dropped two weekend decisions to Xavier and Dayton.

The losses have set UMass back to a 1–11–2 record overall, 1–4–1 in the A–10.

While the Minutemen fell 4–2 on Friday, and 1–0 yesterday against Dayton, the team played markedly better than it had earlier in the season.

"The effort was unquestionably there all weekend," Massachusetts coach Sam Koch said. "However that does not change the fact that the results were unfavorable for us."

Xavier had compiled a 9–5 overall record, 5–0 in the A–10 heading into the matchup with UMass.

The Musketeers put UMass up against the wall by firing three goals past UMass goalkeeper Todd Fowler during the first half.

Koen Kuiken opened up the scoring action by beating Fowler, with the assistance of David Spacarelli and Chas Cooke.

On the play, Cooke fed Spacarelli, who then booted the ball toward the net. Kuiken directed the rebound past a diving Fowler for the tally.

Kuiken picked up his second goal of the afternoon, and his eighth of the season, for the second score of the game to put Xavier ahead 2–0 at the 38:11 mark.

Steven Stamper was credited with the assist on the goal as he set up the play by crossing right to Kuiken who headed the ball in from five feet away from the net.

Slightly over one minute later at 39:15 Cooke came through off a rebound in front of the net, for a 3–0 lead.

UM plays No. 4 MSU

EAST LANSING, Mich. — Playing some of the toughest teams in the nation is nothing new to the Massachusetts hockey team. Neither is dealing with the unfriendly confines of visiting rinks. Hockey East has prepared the Minutemen to deal with all of that.

So when UMass made the trip to Munn Ice Arena in East Lansing, Mich. on Saturday night to face No. 4 Michigan State, it wasn't really much different than heading to such area venues the Whittemore Center in Durham, NH, or Walter Brown Arena in Boston.

Unfortunately, the Minutemen haven't had much success against the upper echelon teams of Hockey East who play in those arenas, and they didn't find things any easier against the Spartans. Although UMass gave MSU as much as it could handle, the hosts still came away with a 3–1 win in front of the 219th consecutive sellout at Munn.

UHS employees say stress increasing, morale decreasing, work conditions inferior

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Administrators of the University of Massachusetts University Health Services (UHS) are employing a fact finder to investigate reports of widespread employee unhappiness and fear of retaliation for speaking out.

A survey was released six months ago that was given to all UHS employees and administrators and revealed 75 percent of respondents felt job stress increased and 89 percent felt morale at UHS had declined over the last year. In addition, 62 percent of the respondents said their job satisfaction had decreased.

"You can work at 150 percent but you can't do it inevitably. Some of them have been asked to do more than they can handle for a long length of time," said Beverly Mayer, dental clinic manager.

"Everything we do we have other people's lives [at stake]. We have to be careful," said Kathy Rhines, manager of radiology and ultrasound and steward of the Service Employees International Union (SEIU). "The front line staff has [to treat] people that are ill and in need. They need to feel good to take care of them."

The survey brought to a head poor relations between employees and administrators and showed considerable negative feedback about UHS Director Bernette Melby.

The survey was distributed by the SEIU and was written by some employees at UHS. The identity of those who wrote the survey is strictly confidential for, as Laboratory Manager Kevin Rhines said, "fear of retaliation."

Out of 215 employees given the survey, 133 individuals responded and 60 percent said they did not feel supported by the UHS director. Sixty–seven percent felt they could not share a difference of opinion with the director without being retaliated against. In regards to Melby's work since she arrived in 1993, 17 percent said her decisions in the past three years had a positive effect on patient care and 74 percent felt Melby could not resolve the current fiscal crisis.

"There is a morale problem in this building for sure. It started back when they started downsizing in 1993 or '94," Mayer said.

However, the survey found there was less criticism about lower level managers.

Sixty–seven percent of respondents felt supported by their immediate supervisor and 41 percent felt supported by division directors.

Also, 66 percent felt they could share differences of opinion with their immediate supervisors without retaliation while 41 percent felt the same about their division directors.

The administration did not respond to the survey's results until this semester. This delay in response served to further upset employees, however Melby said the delay was not intentional.

"It took longer for a whole host of reasons. Let's just say it took longer," Melby said.

"A majority of people don't have confidence. It's up to the administration to respond to that," Kathy Rhines said. "I think people have reached their limit. This happened last spring and no one wanted to go to the press. The administration didn't respond."

Associate Vice–Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo–Anne Vanin, who directly supervises Melby, thinks one cause of employee unhappiness is stress from change.

"When costs are constantly going up asking people to change and accept change, there won't always be agreement on the best path," Vanin said.

"Change is always difficult but [it's] change for the worse. Nurses are not being able to talk to people, educate," said physician's assistant Edward McGlynn of increases in the number of patients seen per day.

"The students aren't the stressful part of this most of the stress comes from the administration. They don't listen to their staff," said one nurse practitioner speaking on condition of anonymity. "You don't feel comfortable. If you should decide to speak out you would be retaliated against. You're just not really sure where you stand."

Nursing Director Carolyn Parker shook her head when asked if she had sensed discontent among her staff.

"People can get fired. You should really be aware of that," cautioned another nurse practitioner when asked to comment about working conditions.

Overnight unit closed

One of the major changes to happen recently was the reduction and moving of the short stay unit. The unit, which houses patients who are sick enough to need care overnight, was moved officially in August from the third floor to the first floor in the Urgent Care area and reduced to one bed to save money.

"There's one bed down the hall. There's no privacy," said McGlynn. "Some nights there's nobody here, some nights there are three or four people here. We're like a lot of health care, where in–patient time is being sharply reduced."

However, Melby said the need for students to stay overnight is declining and keeping the unit open would not be cost effective.

"There is a bed count and a patient count that was telling us we could make this combination," Melby said. "When [nurses] were on the third and first floor they couldn't help each other."

Medical Director Allen Calhoun agreed.

"There aren't that many cases," he said.

But as a result of the move, lay–off notices were given to four of the unit's nurses and caused concern among staffers.

"The layoffs were all people who worked here for years. When they were

Russia's latest figures show rise in poverty

MOSCOW (AP) — Living standards in Russia are falling even faster than previously believed with almost one in three people now living in poverty, according to discouraging figures released yesterday. More than 44 million of Russia's 148 million people live below the poverty line, defined here as less than $32 a month, and 8.4 million are without jobs. And the numbers are likely to climb unless the government comes to grips with the two–month–old economic crisis.

Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov's Cabinet was scheduled today to discuss its budget for the rest of the year, but it has few resources to work with. It is still drafting an economic program to combat the crisis.

An International Monetary Fund delegation was en route to Moscow to negotiate the next disbursement of a $22.6 billion bailout package frozen when the crisis hit in mid–August. First Deputy Prime Minister Yuri Maslyukov said the government was also holding loan talks with Germany and Japan.

The State Statistics Committee said yesterday that the number of Russians who live below the poverty line is up more than 40 percent from last year. It said that 11.5 percent of the workforce was unemployed at the start of October, an increase of 41,000 people in just one month.

Women allowed fewer combat roles in military

WASHINGTON (AP) — Barring women from direct combat roles makes them ineligible for one in six military jobs, according to congressional auditors.

Women served in harm's way in the 1990s in military operations in Bosnia and Somalia, where servicemen were killed, but there were no clearly defined battlefields, the General Accounting Office said in a report yesterday.

In contrast, World War II, Vietnam and the Persian Gulf Wars are examples of conflicts that had traditional battle lines in which it was easy to define forward combat positions, where only men are allowed to fight.

On a battlefield that doesn't have traditional battle lines, which is becoming more common in the post–Cold War era, close operations can take place through the entire area, rather than just at the front, said the report by the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress.

The GAO didn't recommend the Pentagon change its definition of the forward combat jobs that are barred to women, however. Instead, it simply cautioned that modern–day warfare may require a change in the future.

"Should this trend continue, defining direct ground combat as occurring 'well forward on the battlefield' may become increasingly less descriptive of actual battlefield conditions," the report said.

The Pentagon orally agreed with the facts the GAO reported, the report said.

Week designated for UMass student unity

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The kick–off of UMass Week will begin today at the University of Massachusetts featuring organizations, speakers and workshops aimed at building student unity.

The week's activities are sponsored and organized by the Class of 2001 Class Council and are in conjunction with the efforts of various Registered Student Organizations (RSOs).

The process of planning for the events started last semester, when the council wanted to initiate a program that would bring students with different interests together on campus.

Shannon Aucoin, the Interim Advisor of the STudent Alumni Relations Society (STARS) and the Class Council, feels that the week will also be important in showing students the diverse RSOs and group activities available on campus.

"The Council wanted to do something that would showcase the unique organizations on campus," Aucoin said.

Some of the various events taking place during the week include a swing dancing workshop by the UMass Ballroom Dance Club, poetry readings by representatives of the women's studies department, a cleanup by Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, and theatrical performances by the New World Theatre and New Africa House.

The series of guest speakers making appearances on campus include a talk by William T. Thompson today at 7 p.m. in Memorial Hall. Being the first black pilot to attend an all white school in the south, Thompson was the first nominated and approved African–American man to attend the United States Air Force Academy. His lecture will focus on his experiences growing up.

On Friday at 2 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium Jack Canfield, renowned author of Chicken Soup for the Soul, will speak about his journey as an author.

UMass Week was organized in order to be part of the Homecoming Festival this weekend.

"We wanted to try to plan along with Homecoming Weekend," Aucoin said. "Having all the RSOs work together was the best way that we could encourage campus spirit."

Amherst Select Board still up in air over smoking, University Apartments

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Select Board met last night at the Town Hall, discussing issues related to University Apartments and the Board of Health's smoking regulations.

Richard McPalmer, treasurer of Graduate Support Services (GSS), presented a petition requesting the re–targeting of University Apartments for affordable housing. McPalmer said that University Apartments were considered a family housing complex until 1993, and are now mostly vacant.

"The inability of UMass Amherst to provide affordable housing to low–income student families is a burden to the town of Amherst," McPalmer said.

"It is an issue that affects the town because it is impacting real people right now."

Michele Leaf, a lawyer with Student Legal Services spoke on behalf of the Fair Housing Partnership Committee. The committee is supporting the petition presented by McPalmer.

"There is a real housing crisis here... We have to find a way to move affordable housing up on the University's agenda... It is an opportunity for the town and the University to work together," Leaf said.

Both Leaf and Beverly Wood, University of Massachusetts associate vice chancellor for physical planning, stressed cooperation between the town of Amherst and the University as an integral piece of the University Apartments puzzle.

"I believe in developing partnerships and strategic alliances," Wood said.

Wood said that it would be helpful to the University to know the current status of available housing and whether there will be any evolution of that status, as well as what future prospects for housing in the town exist.

She also discussed University efforts to address the issue and the policies already in effect concerning housing.

Amherst Selectman Hill Boss also agreed with Leaf's and Wood's interest in a partnership between the University and the town, and saw the University Apartments situation as "coming to a head."

"We will not be able to avoid this issue any longer," Boss said.

Last night's meeting did not bring any conclusions on the topic.

Toward the end of the meeting, members of the Board of Health discussed developments in both proposed and currently active smoking regulations.

Options such as requiring bar and restaurant owners to have a ventilation system were brought up by the Select Board members; the Board of Health explained that there are expenses that come along with ventilation systems.

"Obviously, the best system is to not smoke," a Board of Health member said.

Selectman Barry Del Castilho explained that the issue has now reached beyond simply smoking in restaurants.

"We've gotten rid of smoking in restaurants," said Del Castilho. "There appears to be a more difficult problem when it comes to bars."

Boss proposed that "the Board [of Health] entertain the idea of a variance."

The Select Board also voted to make recommendations for a petition to make property on West Pomeroy Lane available to building affordable housing.

The evening's discussion also included needed improvements on the track at Amherst Regional High School, the granted liquor license to Maplewood Farms and Restaurant, Inc., and Amherst's role in the Hampshire Council of Government.

Bridge construction rests on today's vote

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

The United States House of Representatives and Senate will vote on a bill today, that would create a $1 million traffic management initiative for the Coolidge Bridge in Northampton.

The Fiscal Year 1999 Transportation Appropriations legislation is an initiative to deal with potential traffic problems that might result from the bridge restoration project.

Congressman John W. Olver (D–Mass.), in a press release last week, said it is necessary for this community to be prepared for future congestion problems.

"Hopefully, this funding will ease concerns by providing regular travellers with up–to–date information. Obviously, the goal is to make the transition — from a bottleneck to a wider bridge — as smooth as possible," Olver said.

The funding, according to a press release, will be used mainly for a traffic operations center at the University of Massachusetts.

This center will provide traffic updates and recommend alternate routes through cable access television, radio, bulletin boards, signs at traffic and parking areas, Internet web pages, information kiosks, and a telephone hotline.

Organizing the center at the University is Beverly Wood, associate chancellor of campus planning, who was not available for comment.

The initiative also aims to develop traffic reduction strategies with the surrounding towns of Amherst and Hadley, the City of Northampton, and the UMass campus. It will also involve Peter Pan bus lines and the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) in the planning.

Wendy Frankson, a spokesperson from Olver's office, said the initiative will serve two purposes.

"There is a lot of anxiety over the bridge, a.) traffic and b.) worries associated with expansion," Frankson said.

Congressman Olver is a member of the House Transportation Subcommittee and included the recommendation for the traffic management project in the Fiscal Year 1999 Bill.

Earlier this year, Olver was able to secure $9.2 million for the Coolidge Bridge widening project which will relieve the heavy congestion from the UMass campus and surrounding municipalities.

Construction is slated to begin next year.

Man to go off of AIDS cocktail

By Tom Kirchofer
Associated Press

BOSTON — A man infected with the AIDS virus has volunteered to stop taking the three-drug cocktail that has kept him healthy for 18 months so doctors can see if he can do without it.

Though other AIDS patients have gone off medication and lived with manageable levels of the virus, this is believed to be the first time researchers will monitor such a case.

"There are a lot of anecdotes, but there's been really no systematic study that I'm aware of," said Dr. Clifford Lane, who plans to launch a similar study later this fall at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases.

Nineteen other AIDS patients from around Boston will also participate in the Massachusetts General Hospital study led by Dr. Bruce Walker, including others who will stop taking the AIDS cocktail.

Walker hopes to prove that patients treated early — before the virus kills disease-fighting cells — would be able to stop treatment and live without the side effects, expense and hassle of drug cocktails.

While there is no way to eliminate the virus from the body, drugs have successfully lowered it to undetectable levels in many patients. But the patients suffer a variety of side effects, including dangerously high cholesterol, diabetes, kidney stones and intestinal problems.

"It could give us a better perspective on whether we can think in terms of stopping drugs," said Dr. Anthony Fauci, head of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases.

Patients who stop taking medication risk having their conditions worsen, he said. There is also a possibility that the drugs may no longer work if the patient chooses to resume taking them.

"But it's more likely that if the virus comes back, it will come back in a manner that's sensitive to the drugs," Fauci said. Patients who volunteer for such studies are aware of the risks, Fauci said.

Two years ago, a German man stopped taking AIDS medication against his doctors' orders. His virus remains at undetectable levels.

Walker's study could lead to effective yet less aggressive treatment methods in developing countries, which have most of the world's AIDS cases but the fewest resources to fight the disease. Lane said he doubted less intense drug regimens would have a noticeable impact on the disease in the Third World because authorities there are still struggling to educate people on how to halt the spread of the virus.

Federal court refuses to force book ban

By Bob Egelko
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal appeals court yesterday rejected a black woman's request to remove Huckleberry Finn and a William Faulkner story from the required-reading list at her daughter's Arizona high school.

Courts cannot "ban books or other literary works from school curricula on the basis of their content...even when the works are accused of being racist," the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said.

The court allowed the parent, Kathy Monteiro, to sue the Tempe Union High School District for allegedly failing to respond to complaints that white students were harassing blacks with racial slurs and graffiti. But the judges said the school could not be required to remove the books as a way to reduce harassment. Ms. Monteiro had sought to remove Mark Twain's The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn and Faulkner's A Rose for Emily from the required-reading list for ninth-grade English classes.

She was unhappy that her daughter, now a senior at McClintock High School, had to read the books which repeatedly use the word "nigger."

The lawsuit said the assignment of the books discriminated against black students, created a racially hostile environment and caused an increase in harassment.

U.S. District Judge Stephen McNamee dismissed the lawsuit in January 1997, saying he was aware that the language in the books was offensive and hurtful but did not find their assignment discriminatory.

In yesterday's ruling, the appeals court said a student's constitutional rights are violated when a book that has educational value, as determined by the school district, is removed from a required-reading list by threat of a lawsuit.

Ms. Monteiro's lawyer, Stephen Montoya, said the ruling was a victory overall, because the court agreed that a school district cannot allow a racially hostile environment to persist. He disagreed with the court's response to the complaint about books. The school district's lawyer, Allison Lewis, was unavailable for comment. A telephone call to the superintendent's office was not returned.

Visit Our Booth During The Job Fair

given their layoff notices no one knew why," McGlynn said. "It was terribly intimidating. I've never seen them that upset."

There probably were excess people in the building who didn't need to be here in some areas. It went overboard. Too many people were let go," Mayer said.

The nurses are currently in negotiations for other jobs in UHS, but the notices will still be pending in December if other jobs can't be negotiated.

"We're still negotiating," Melby said. "If it works out well for these staff we would be delighted to have them stay. Our goal has always been to avoid layoffs."

However, Simon Keochakian of SEIU Local 509 feels the new job offers are a way to force people to quit.

Some of the nurses given layoff notices worked only during the school year, a 43-week contract, but were offered contracts that would require them to work for 52 weeks.

"If you're trying to save money where does the logic say you have to accept a 52-week contract," Keochakian said. "That's how you get rid of people. You make working there unattractive."

Melby said the reason some nurses were offered longer contracts despite being laid off to save money, is that it doesn't equal the same expense to have two people splitting up the year than one working year round.

"If you only schedule an on-going person to do it you have that one person's cost," Melby said. "It does not equal out."

Administrators say the jobs had to be cut to save money but efforts are being made to keep the individuals working at UHS.

"The people were offered jobs in a different location or different time frame. They had a chance to accept change or not," Calhoun said.

"We care a great deal for our staff. We care a lot about our students and we want to be fiscally responsible as well as responsible to our staff," Melby said.

Ombudsman assess comments

There was a space left on the survey for individuals to write comments.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

A fact finder will speak with UHS employees later this month.

University Ombudsman Robert Ackerman was enlisted to summarize the comments in a report but not "evaluate these comments, or to suggest what implication for action they may suggest."

He wrote a three-and-a-half-page summary which addressed employee dissatisfaction in several aspects.

"A first casual reading of the comments indicates a widespread conviction that morale in UHS is extremely low, often coupling this with a time frame or a remark associating the low morale with the current director's managerial performance, and it also indicates how finances are being handled in UHS. Some of the comments indicate that patient care is currently severely compromised in UHS," Ackerman wrote in the summary report.

"I respect the ombudsman's assessment. That becomes another piece of information," Vanin said.

"If we felt we were giving inadequate care that would be the breaking point," McGlynn said.

Ackerman found some individuals voiced strong criticisms.

"Twenty-nine of these 56 comments have specific negative things to report about Bernie Melby as director," Ackerman wrote. "A number of comments suggest that Bernie Melby should or must be dismissed as director if UHS is to mount a satisfactory health service in the future, a view perhaps most succinctly expressed in a comment I will now quote in full: 'CAN BERNIE.'"

But in his assessment he found nine individuals who did not agree with the criticism of Melby and UHS. He said four of the nine felt they were not involved enough in UHS to comment.

"The other five express concerns about the survey, the intentions behind the survey, and possible bias in the survey. One of these (a signed comment from Fran Deats) suggests that the survey is not consistent with the CQI process," Ackerman wrote. "The remaining four comments in this group accuse the survey of targeting the director."

Ackerman also found comments regarding low morale.

"The comments about morale are easier to summarize in that they uniformly report that morale is low in UHS," Ackerman stated. "Staff cutbacks have resulted in increased workloads according to many of the comments."

Director's qualifications questioned

The Ombudsman's summary also included criticisms that Melby is not qualified for the director's position.

Melby was chosen as the interim director of UHS while a nation wide search was conducted. After the search was completed, Melby was hired with support from the students.

"I went through a search process and I would say 20 years of experience in college health is significant," Melby said. "I think by being nominated by the students on this campus after a year is significant."

However, Keochakian charges that Melby did not have a master's degree when she was hired and had inadequate previous experience.

"It is inconceivable that with a nation wide search she was the most qualified," Keochakian said.

Melby said she had finished all the work for her master's degree except for her thesis.

She was previously employed at the University of Minnesota in its health services area handling various jobs.

"She's been gon.. five years and I still really miss her. She is extremely bright and good at solving problems and her people skills were excellent," said Gailon Roen, associate director and chief operations officer at the University of Minnesota's health services and former supervisor of Melby. "She was responsible for nearly everything in this health service."

Assessing the survey

Neither Melby, Nursing Director Parker nor Medical Director Calhoun would comment on the survey's formulation, objectivity or results except to say the survey was taken at a time when people were worn out.

"Towards the end of the year people get a little grouchy and a little tired," Calhoun said. "It's expressed by various ways."

Vanin, who directly supervises Melby, said the survey is not representative of the whole situation.

"It's a piece of information. It doesn't give the whole picture. The message to me of the survey was we need to look at issues," Vanin said.

But Kevin Rhines, manager of the laboratory, disagrees.

"I think it is the whole story. I think part of the evidence that it is the whole story is that so many people responded," he said. "Normally it's hard to get 50 percent [to respond]. Most of the people responded negatively."

The survey, which was given to every employee at every level of health services, had a response rate of 61 percent. All staff members, except physicians and upper level administration, are in a union. In health services there are three unions: the SFIU, the American Federation for State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) and the University Staff Association (USA).

Thirty-eight percent of the respondents were members of the SFIU. Forty-one percent were members of USA and one percent were with AFSCME. Eleven percent of the respondents did not belong to a union and nine percent did not state if they were with a union or not.

Financial troubles

The financial crisis addressed in the summary report is the primary catalyst for the changes at UHS. There is a fund deficit that is forcing health services to find more cost effective ways to operate because student fees cannot be raised to pay for rising costs.

"[By] seeking to keep the cost of attending the University down they have to look at how they do business," Vanin said. "Seek economy without compromising quality."

UHS is funded entirely by student money in the form of a trust fund.

"The situation didn't get looked a until this point. There was five years of fiscal mismanagement to get to this point," said Kathy Rhines.

Several areas have to do more things with less staff in order to save money. One part of UHS may have to fold under the economic pressure.

Dentistry currently has one dentist who comes in three times a week. More dentists cannot be hired due to budget constraints according to Beverly Mayer, dental clinic manager.

"Our first available appointment is in January," she said.

The clinic was subsidized until 1988-89 Mayer said and was able to survive until there were cutbacks in staff.

However, Mayer said while some staff positions that were cut earlier have been restored, without dentists the clinic will continue to lose money.

"We're having to refer them out," she said. "The message that is coming to us now is if we can't cover our costs they will probably have to close the dental clinic."

Mayer said she does not think the clinic will be able to pay all their bills and will close at the end of the year.

"We're hoping if it were to happen and word got out, there would be some sort of human cry from the students. There is definitely a need for us here and area dentists cannot handle [all the student patients]," Mayer said.

The fact finder/arbitrator, Nancy Peace, will be coming to speak to UHS employees and administration for three days later this month and will then write a report about what she finds.

Justice dept. orders California marijuana club to shut down

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) — California's largest remaining medical marijuana club was closed yesterday by a court order obtained by the Justice Department.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, without comment, denied a request by the Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Cooperative to remain open during an appeal of a federal judge's ruling finding the club in contempt of court for continuing to distribute marijuana in violation of federal law.

Shortly before the 5 p.m. deadline, leaders of the organization started carrying out boxes of files and said they were closing voluntarily and cooperating with federal marshals.

Jeff Jones, executive director of the club, issued a statement saying Californians who backed Proposition 215, the November 1996 medical marijuana initiative, "have had their votes nullified today by the efforts of a heavy-handed and misguided federal government."

The club, which claimed 2,200 patients as members, was one of six in Northern California sued by the Justice Department for violating the federal law against distribution of marijuana. Of the six, only clubs in Ukiah and Fairfax remain open, along with a handful of others around the state.

Proposition 215 allowed patients and their caregivers to possess and grow marijuana without prosecution under California law, if recommended by a doctor to relieve the pain from AIDS or cancer treatment, glaucoma or other conditions.

The initiative had no effect, however, on federal laws against distribution of marijuana.

Mike's groovin' again

Act I: Subterfuge

Somehow I notice the brightly colored stickers on everybody's bumper, a fresh sign on everyone's front lawn, but they don't seem to affect me. Ah, election season. It seems as if these people want to either brag about their choice ("I'm voting for Cellucci, and I don't care who knows") or they want to try and seduce the easily manipulated ("I'm voting for Harshbarger: Come and join the party!"). As if the sight of a political sticker on a run- down car makes us think about who we're voting for: "If he has a Hyundai, and he's voting for Harshbarger, he must know something. I'm voting with that iconoclast with the broken muffler!"

Mike Messaros

Lost in all of this is the actual truth of the matter, that we have two babies ready to suck their thumbs and point their fingers at each other in a futile attempt to out-shout the other. "Wah! You raise taxes!" "Wah! You have stinky pants!"

Lost in all the loudness and the din of rhetoric are the issues, the people, and most of all, the children.

But there are two reasons why the shiny stickers and mudslinging have not grabbed my attention: One is that I'm from out of state, I'm not even from New England. The other is that I'm intent on starting my career as a stripper.

Act II: Revelation

Or, I'm sorry, an "upscale gentleman entertainer." Last week, when one popular gentleman's club advertised for "attractive entertainers over 18," a hue and cry rose from some female friends. Why? I asked. I know my calling when I see it. Hey, I said, they didn't specify who they wanted, male or female; they're leaving the door wide open to a young firebrand like myself. And I'm attractive. My mom told me so. Aside from the few extra pounds I've packed on (winter's coming — it's my own little package of warmth), my money maker's ready for some shakin' — cha-ching!

> "For those of you who don't know, one's groove is like registering to vote: you only have it so long as you use it at least once every two years."

And what else am I going to do with an English degree from UMass?

But I had to get my groove back. I had lost my groove from years of underuse. For those of you who don't know, one's groove is like registering to vote: you only have it so long as you use it at least once every two years. And my groove has been dormant like Vesuvius.

But stripping is not all physical. It's a very mental thing. I have to think sexy. It's all in the eyes.

At the same time, I have to remove emotion, just like a good defense lawyer or doctor. "You cannot get emotionally attached," they tell me, and you can see the ghosts in their eyes. They are full of promises whispered, watered down champagne shared in lounges and phone numbers from customers hastily scrawled on ten dollar bills: "I can make you happy."

I have to get used to being treated like a piece of meat. It's not about my mind anymore. But I'm ready, willing and prepared. I've seen Showgirls — ("It's for class," I volunteered to the cashier at Blockbuster, but the look in her eye said she wasn't buying it. The sad thing was, I wasn't lying. This time. I mean, I was lying when I said I was renting Indecent Behavior 2 for a sick friend. What am I now, the boy who cried wolf?) — I'm ready for anything, especially if Kyle McLachlen invites me back to his pad to show me his "fine art."

Act III: Denouement

But where was my groove? And how could I reactivate it? It wasn't like getting your long distance back up when you return to school. When I was a kid I used to think about exactly what made Superman fly: did he think about it? Did he have some special muscle that could do it? I used to stand in front of my house for hours eyes tightly closed, my fists balled up tightly, trying to trip that mental switch that would lift me off of the ground. People would drive past slowly, whispering to their kids: "That's the Messaros boy. He's a little touched."

"Argh," to quote Lucy from "Peanuts." Who would have thought that wanting to strip would awaken such existential pain and regret? Who would have thought that such deep searching epistemological concerns would spring from exotic dancing?

So I decided to learn from lack of example. How does the old joke go? What is the opposite of groove?

A candidate's debate (I never said it was a funny joke). And to think that I was brushing them off because I was from out of state.

That night I watched two grown men fight like children over a rattle. Cartoon daggers coming out of each other's eyes. Perfectly coiffed hair. I watched Young Republicans compare striped and paisley (if they were feeling wild) ties. I watched Student Government members aspiring to greatness. There was very little groove going on.

And it slowly crept back. Dee-Lite was right: groove is in the heart. To think people believe that these two do nothing for the public school student.

With my groove in check, I went down to the gentleman's club, spirits high. But they wouldn't accept me. Something about my tummy. "But it's my own little package of warmth," I explained. "It's pasty, hairy and it looks like you've had too many jellybeans," they said. "It's because I'm white, isn't it?" I challenged. They kicked me out.

It's all politics in stripping. I blame it on "the Man." Ah, a dream deferred. At least I got my groove back

The dating game

What has happened to chivalry today? Have chivalrous practices perished with the onslaught of new-wave "super- feminists?" Where was I when "gentleman" was deemed a bad word? These are questions I have pondered for quite some time now. I wonder what happened to the days when a man would hold a door open for a woman, or pull her chair out before she sat. Are modern feminists to blame for the decline in acts most consider simply polite, or are men becoming increasingly less concerned with their treatment of women all on their own? Here are my thoughts on the subject.

> "I wear skirts, and heels, and yes (dare I say it?) I even own a miracle bra!"
> Carissa Hiltsley

I wear skirts, and heels, and yes (dare I say it?) I even own a miracle bra! And, here comes the clincher (dun-dun- dun-dunnn): I am also a UMass cheerleader! An outline of the stereotypical "feminist's" worst nightmare I suppose. So does any of this make me a bad person or any less of a "feminist" than the girl sitting next to me with unshaven legs and armpits, and a t-shirt that says in big red letters, "GIRLS RULE!"? I think not. Have I succumbed to the male–dominated unwritten social laws of society simply because I appreciate doors being held open and chairs being pulled out? Again, I don't think so.

I believe in women's rights; I believe in rights for all people. I consider myself a strong advocate for gender equality, but so what if I also appreciate these occasional chivalrous acts. Sure I am completely capable of doing all of these things by my own dainty little hand, but it's nice to know that there are still a few guys out there who haven't been scared away by these "feminists," for lack of a better word, attitudes.

I do not expect these things from the opposite sex, but I, along with many other girls, do appreciate them — there's a big difference. I take notice of the guy who holds the door open (hint, hint). I see these acts as polite gestures, not attempts to patronize or "princessize," as I like to call it.

Yes women, we are strong, and intelligent, and capable, and I think it takes a woman with each of these qualities to truly value chivalry in a society like ours. So girls, relax! That guy that offered you his hand in an attempt to help you down that hill the other day wasn't suggesting, "You, weak little woman, I, big strong man," he was just being polite. Say 'thank-you,' and appreciate it, since acts like these are becoming few and far between nowadays.

Don't get me wrong; I realize that the battle for gender equality is far from being won, but I do not believe that accepting and appreciating chivalry will set us back from accomplishing that ultimate goal: equality. It bothers me just as much as the next girl that, on average, the American working woman will only make sixty-five cents for every dollar a man makes. But, like I said, it takes a strong, intelligent woman to appreciate and understand the difference between what is patronizing, and what is chivalrous. It may be a long time before an entirely fair and equal society exists but, in the meantime, lighten up and learn to just say thank-you once in a while, ladies!

Guys, I'm not suggesting you toss your two–hundred dollar jacket onto a puddle in the path of the girl walking beside you on a rainy day, just don't hesitate to do the little things like opening her car door first, even before you get in, or pulling her chair out on your next dinner–date. Chances are she'll notice and she'll thank you for it. Trust me, there is nothing wrong with being a gentleman.

Carissa Hiltsley is a UMass student.

The single guy

There are no single girls at UMass. There aren't. Believe me, it has been proven scientifically that there are no single girls on this campus. I have looked. I have asked around. I even ask my female friends if they have single friends. The most typical response is "All my friends have boyfriends."

At first I was incredulous. I figured that if I didn't know any single girls, then at least other girls would have to know some. After all, everyone knows that girls know more about girls than guys do. I know single guys. I know lots of single guys. So my response to my friend is "All your friends have boyfriends?"

> "This school must put some extra box on the female application to check whether you have a boyfriend or not."
> Matthew Frascella

"Well I have two friends who don't. One is seeing someone and the other is weird." So maybe I exaggerated a little. There are four single girls. Where they are I don't know. I think the University hides them in some undisclosed location along with all the vital paperwork that always seems to get misplaced.

All the girls I know are together with someone. I know one girl who has had a boyfriend for seven years. Do you know how long that is? 1991, seven years ago, George Bush was president, Saturday Night Live was still funny, Pearl Jam had just released its first album, and the Chicago Bulls had just won their first NBA championship. Other friends aren't quite as bad: four years, three years and the occasional one year. If I had a girlfriend since high school, I would want her to go to school here because this place is like a storage facility. We would be guaranteed to stay together.

Everywhere I turn people are together: In my dorm, on campus, at the library. How does this happen? I can't figure it out. My freshman roommate has a girlfriend and he has only been here a month and a half. Now there are three single girls.

I came here and I thought, "Wow, thousands of single girls, how great is this?" Quickly I learned the law of boyfriends: namely every UMass girl has one.

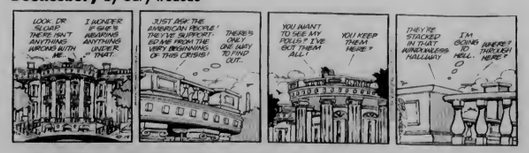
Last year I was very naive, I was a freshman, don't hold it against me. I met a girl in one of my classes. I introduced myself and we studied together a few times. I asked her if she wanted to go out on Saturday. She said yes and I was psyched. After she blew me off twice I got the hint. Once was bad timing, twice was a sign. I may be single, but I am not stupid. Two months later I found out the boyfriend rule was responsible. She had one the whole time and didn't bother to tell me. One of my friends found out and she told me. I had learned my first lesson in Boyfriend Law.

I accepted the fact that maybe freshman guys were just doomed to failure. It is common knowledge that girls always date older guys, so when I returned to the University of Marriedchusetts this fall I felt more confident. I am a sophomore now and have some status, more than when I was a freshman. But I still haven't met a girl who doesn't have a boyfriend. They all do.

Being the gentleman that I am, I never go against the boyfriend rule and chase after girls with boyfriends. After all, if I went through all the trouble of finding one of the three single girls on this campus of thousands, then I would be pretty pissed off if some loser came up and started hitting on my girlfriend.

I don't normally get upset about this type of thing, but the situation is really frustrating. Somehow three single girls is not a just ratio to the numerous single guys. I have friends at other school who think that I am crazy. "How can you not have single girls at your school?" They have tons of single girls. When they come to visit me they find out.

I guess I am a major sap. I love the fall: the colors of the changing leaves and even the crisp weather, especially here in western Massachusetts. The nights are clear and the stars are amazing. I hate the fact that I can't share that with anyone. I want someone to watch the sunset with, to cook for, to send a bouquet of flowers to, someone whose eyes I can look into and study for hours. Instead, I look around at all the girls on the phone long distance to some absentee boyfriend. What is the point of that?



I swear to God that this school must put some extra box on the female application to check whether you have a boyfriend or not. Maybe it is some insurance discount incentive. The only thing more infamous than the lack of single girls is the propensity of this school to cut corners to save a buck. Maybe that is why the statistics on single girls are left out of the University information: it saves some ink.

So, as I continue now in my second year at UMass, I am running out of time. I only have a semester and a half left to meet all the people I am going to. After that it is junior year and most people reluctantly abandon the "gourmet delicatessen" DC's and venture off–campus. It can only be harder to find the three single girls that are here if I don't even live on–campus.

Deep down you all know it is true, so save your complaint letters. There are no single girls here. My friends all agree. It is the law of UMass. If you are a single guy, then best of luck. You are going to need it because we are all fighting over the same three girls.

Remembering our haunted past

Winfrey, Glover shine in Demme's Beloved

BELOVED
Directed by Jonathan Demme with Oprah Winfrey, Danny Glover and Kimberly Elise
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

The memory of slavery is often confined to the basement of the American imagination, rarely allowed into the neat- and-tidy kitchen of Hollywood. Into this near vacuum comes Beloved, an imperfect but passionate adaption of Toni Morrison's classic novel. The novel and the movie are vivid ghost stories, works of art that struggle to carry the lost into the light; that force us to remember. Beloved haunts us as we should be haunted.

Beloved is set in rural Ohio after the Civil War, specifically at the house of Sethe (Oprah Winfrey), an iron- willed former runaway slave. Sethe and her taciturn daughter Denver (Kimberly Elise) live alone, quietly isolated from the surrounding community for reasons that are not immediately clear. Their equilibrium is shattered first by the arrival of Paul D, (Danny Glover), a man from Sethe's past, and then by the appearance of Beloved (Thandie Newton), a mysterious, childlike woman who may or may not be the spirit of Sethe's murdered daughter made flesh. There is much more going on, but the movie resists easy plot summaries. The movie is, however, much easier to follow than the novel, which has both its plus and minuses.

Beloved's themes of overpowering emotion and memory are served brilliantly by the novel's enveloping, impressionistic streams of language and unpredictable use of time. You can not just read the novel, you have to swim into it. The movie carves Morrison's dense prose into something resembling linear narrative, making it more accessible but also less unsettling.

The primary example of the movie's shortcomings is the character of Beloved herself, an enigmatic entity nailed down by the camera into one physical body. The novel's Beloved exists at the edges of perception, a mixture of actual and imagined, between a ghost and an uncontrollable memory. The movie's Beloved exists too firmly in the real world.

What the movie lacks in psychic complexity it makes up for in firmness and directness, qualities the novel lacked. In particular, the character of Denver has a strong presence, due at least to a nicely restrained performance from Kimberly Elise. In the last third of the movie the tight focus on Sethe crawls with perfect inevitability to Denver, the previously shut-in daughter who must suddenly care for her disintegrating mother. It is Denver, not Sethe, who eventually leaves home and rejoins the community. Denver does not forget her past or ignore it, she simply decides to carry her memories and history into the outside world instead of locking herself away. Because of Denver's strength and the aim of the linear narrative toward the future, the last scenes of the movie have a hard won tinge of hope that is not as clearly stated in the novel.

Beloved is a well–made American film that deserves to be seen as much for the skill with which it was put together as for its honest handling of sensitive subject matter. The only production miscue is the score, which is too clean and often annoyingly contemporary–sounding. Most everything else is well thought–out. Director Jonathan Demme's smooth style combined with frequent double exposures and the weird, dark blue–green light floating through the house help create a matter–of–fact eerie atmosphere that allows what mingling of memory and reality there is, to seem natural and not forced.

The acting is also impressive, with both Oprah Winfrey and Danny Glover somehow managing to temporarily erase their more well known personas as talk show host and goofy sidekick, respectively. Winfrey's steely performance is especially wonderful. She deserves an Oscar nomination not only for her acting, but also for the effort she put into pushing the movie through production.

In the end, what is important is that Beloved is a well–told story of a part of American history that we do not hear enough about, style and translation quibbles aside. Beloved will not let us forget our past; it is a vision of memory, racism and pain that is impossible to ignore. Beloved is strange, shocking, and sad, but most of all, it is necessary. A–

Swinging star Vaughn kills 'em with Pigeons and upcoming Psycho

By Cynthia Webb
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Vince Vaughn doesn't care if people think he's crazy for portraying serial killers.

He has always been able to do things differently yet still come out ahead. The 6-foot-5-inch Vaughn broke onto the scene a few years ago as the video-game loving, bar-hopping actor of Swingers, who was on the prowl for "beautiful babies" and made the saying, "You're so money" seem hip.

Vaughn, 28, plays a killer in Clay Pigeons and will star as the equally demented Norman Bates in Gus Van Sant's remake of the Alfred Hitchcock classic, Psycho.

Based on his dead-on performances, will people think he's a womanizing, smooth-talking, borderline psychotic, too?

"It would be nothing new for me," laughs Vaughn, rubbing his stubbly baby face. Still, he warns, "Perception can be a bad thing."

He says the real Vince is often "painfully shy" and only turns up his humor if he likes someone. If people are mean, he can be downright "boisterous."

Over a lunch of chicken tacos near his Los Feliz home, Vaughn speaks quickly, almost in a stream of consciousness. If his hands aren't gesturing while he speaks, he taps them on the table.

Every so often, his denim-clad leg jitters below the booth. Vaughn is always on the move, even while he sits — perhaps a remnant of a childhood hyperactive streak.

Vaughn offers a scary portrayal of a madman in Clay Pigeons — a twisted, at times comic, tale of a gas-station attendant who is befriended by a mysterious cowboy drifter named Lester Long (played by Vaughn).

Vaughn said he didn't know the film would be released only months before Psycho, but shows

MFA captures essence of Monet

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Claude Monet is one of the most celebrated artists ever. When one thinks of the genre of Impressionism, his name instantly comes to mind. However this pop fame has in some ways diminished Monet's importance as an artist. A new show at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Monet: In the 20th Century, attempts to capture the essence of Monet's work as it changed throughout his life while remaining fundamentally the same.

Monet and other inpressionists began their careers during the 1860s and 1870s. They thought that "art should express its own time and place and capture the artist's immediate visual experience with an appropriately modern style."

Although, as the century progressed, many of these impressionists began to alter their ideas of Impressionism as the field was flooded with new artists bringing new ideas. In the face of this, Monet declared, "I am still an Impressionist and will always remain one." He held this true until his death in 1926.

As the new century approached, Monet was hailed as "one of the supreme landscape painters of the 19th century. In spite of this monumental achievement, Monet still continued painting into the 20th century, producing nearly 450 paintings including some of the most important of his career."

"Didn't Monet get bored painting the same things over and over again?," someone was overheard asking at the show. To many the answer to this question would be, yes. But to Monet, he did not see that he was painting the same thing over and over, rather with each painting he was seeing something entirely different.

This is especially evident with the Water Lilies series which he painted from 1903–1909. Monet was "experimenting with unconventional formats and the different relationships between the real and the reflected."

With the progression of his series paintings, Monet was able to capture slight and ever-changing nuances of his subjects. Each painting captures the differences in time and place, whether it be the angle of the sunlight, the colors of the season, or changes in the atmosphere. Monet was able to freeze and make immortal the essence of these living objects that are long since dead. He claimed that flowers were what gave him inspiration to be a painter.

Monet possessed a desire to elevate public taste. In his later works however, he began to paint strictly for himself, all but forgetting his public audience. In this time, Monet began to develop new ways of exploring the natural world.

The paintings in this collection are darker and appear to be blurrier than his earlier, more famous paintings. These features are said to have been a "deliberate aesthetic choice." Most people assume that this change in his work was due to the cataracts on his eyes, but according to Gillian Wohlauer, senior lecturer of the MFA's Division of Education and Public Programs, "contrary to popular belief, the difficulty with his eyes did not greatly impair Monet's ability to render form." He continued to paint things as he saw them. As he got older, Monet saw the world in a different way than when he was a young man, as is reflected in his previous works.

What Monet called the Grandes Decorations — sweeping panoramas of sky and foliage reflected on the surface of the water-lily pond — were the last great works of his long career. They were the fruition of Monet's 1897 vision of creating "monumental paintings arranged to surround viewers with peace and beauty."

Monet realized as he said here, "I don't have much longer to live and I must dedicate all of my time to painting, with the hope of arriving at something that is good, or that satisfies me, if that is possible." Whether or not he ever satisfied this goal we will never know, but what we can and do know is that he created an entire universe — through his way of seeing the world — which can help us to appreciate ours.

Through his work, Monet allows us to be, for a second, suspended outside of temporal and spatial existence. He gives us a chance to appreciate the seemingly boring world as one of beauty and brilliance constantly surrounding us.

no worry about being pegged as the guy who can only portray wackos.

Van Sant said Vaughn's physical appearance helped him get the Psycho role.

"Vince came in for a meeting when we started to cast the film and he scared my assistant because of the way he looked," the director said.

"He had close-cropped hair and a short beard ... but there was something quite deep in his gaze which helped me make the decision to cast him. Not looking like Anthony Perkins helped, too."

Vaughn said he drew on personal experience to help the two characters come alive: "I identify with the fact of being young and not being understood — of having people come at you and not being able to protect myself."

Vaughn has tracked dinosaurs in Steven Spielberg's sci-fi thriller The Lost World: Jurassic Park, and co-starred with Anne Heche in the recent love drama Return to Paradise.

"I like people who are real, and I don't like to play characters that try to be liked," he says.

The Midwestern-bred actor — born in Minnesota, raised in Illinois — said he has never tried to win praise by following the norm.

"I was weird. I'm a kid that they took to a psychiatrist at 5. They thought I was crazy because I was never a follower," Vaughn says. "I was a kid who would take tap class and then I would go play football...I was always lucky that I could do my own thing."

School was not his forte. He remembers talking back to teachers and going to detention, even if it was to stick up for other kids he felt were being wronged.

"I had a lot of confidence. I think I got it from my parents that you can't just let people pick on you," Vaughn says.

"I had teachers yelling at me all the time. But I had one teacher who never yelled or anything. He pulled me outside and said, 'I just wanted to tell you, you let me down.'" cried my eyes out, even at 13 years old, because I wasn't as comfortable with that. I guess. My journey has been getting more comfortable with that sort of thing.

At the suggestion of the school, he went to counseling and then was put in a special class for a while.

"It was like, 'He's got issues. He's hyperactive. Talks out in class and stuff like that.' So they made me go."

Vaughn's parents decided acting would be a good outlet for his energy. At age 7, he was in school plays and community theater.

After high school, he did some work in Chicago — even temporarily joining an improv group.

"I liked (acting) because I liked movies. I thought they were really cool," says Vaughn, who likes to tell stories using Marlon Brando films as a point of reference.

Vaughn skipped college and headed to Los Angeles at 18, leaving behind a life that had always been full of contrasts. He was raised both Protestant and Catholic; born poor but later transplanted to a rich Chicago suburb; obtrusive at school, yet still popular.

He describes his dad, Vernon, as being a hardworking man from a "redneck outdoor plumbing farm in Ohio."

"My dad put himself through college, served in the Navy, and became a self-made man and made a lot of bread," he says. "He worked in an insane asylum at night so he could do his homework and put the kids to bed. He was so determined to change his life existence."

When Vaughn was in elementary school, the family — parents and two older sisters — moved to affluent Lake Forest. His parents have since divorced.

"It was such an extreme thing," he says. "So I was forced to sort of look away at the kind of exteriors — of needing a place to fit in, trying to find a group — to find the individual."

Vaughn uses this philosophy to stay ahead of the game in Hollywood — being up front with people and "being honest with yourself."

UM X–C takes 15th at New Englands

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

This past weekend, the Massachusetts men's cross country team took the fifteenth spot at the New England Championships in Boston.

UMass scored 407 points; 46 better than last year. Providence led with 31 points, followed by Dartmouth (56) in second, and Brown (74) in third.

This was the largest meet of the season for the Minutemen, as 300 runners from 42 different schools were competing. Junior Kevin Somers (25:35) led the UMass runners with a 38th overall finish. Senior Dan LeBoeuf (25:25) placed 60th, and rounding out the top three for UMass was junior Sean Murphy (26:10) who placed 95th overall.

This marked the fourth consecutive time that Somers had finished among the top two Minutemen runners. Though some of his runners finished with quick and impressive times, UMass head coach Ken O'Brien was rather disappointed with the meet as a whole.

"Somers, LeBoeuf, and Murphy all ran well, but less than 50 percent of our team had an optimal performance," O'Brien said.

In past meets, the Minutemen have hogged the top 10, and have really shown their athleticism to its fullest. But this week marked the end of a three-week lag period, during which the Minutemen had not competed at all.

"If we didn't have so much time off, we surely would have performed much better. The two weeks definitely hurt the team a little bit. We had the potential to place within the top ten. It's quite disappointing," O'Brien said.

"The veterans on the team actually benefit from the long break, but it hurts the newer runners. They need the constant competition so they get used to it."

This race crosses the halfway point for the season and the remaining three tests of skill are championship meets. The men have a week off between each meet to focus, train, and prepare to dust the awaiting opposition.

From here on, everything counts. The NCAA district qualifier is in less than a month, followed by the NCAA championships two weeks later.

But for now, the squad has one week to regain their composure and prepare to fight for the top spot at the Atlantic 10 Championships in Philadelphia on October 31.

"Though the final scores haven't been etched in stone yet, we'll definitely be in the top two," said O'Brien in regards to the A–10 meet.

Women's XC has another good outing

By Sean Lavoine
Collegian Correspondent

Most ill college students spend their time running up their parent's phone bill while they seek sympathy recuperating in their dorm room.

The Massachusetts women's cross country team did exactly the opposite last Friday as they took sixth place at the New England Championships held at Franklin Park in Boston.

Despite having three of their top seven runners feeling ill or nursing injuries, UMass put together a gutsy performance to earn another high finish.

"Everybody gave what they could despite our different degrees of health," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said.

Junior Sally Hirsch (ankle sprain) and seniors Tracy Meagher and Nicole Way (respiratory problems) put their health problems behind them and helped UMass earn their second straight top 10 finish.

The Minutewomen were paced by freshman sensation Kristen Cisowski who finished 23rd with a time of 18:18. Right behind Cisowski was sophomore Melissa Henderson who finished 29th overall at 18:22.

"They both ran an outstanding race," LaFreniere said.

Rounding out the top five for UMass were junior Sharon Tillotson at 18:37 (50th overall), Hirsch at 18:46 (65th overall), and Way at 18:54 (79th overall).

"Sally ran a tough race," LaFreniere said.

She most certainly did. Over the past month Hirsch has had two ankle sprains and respiratory problems that reached their peak two days before the race.

Way has had no easy time of it either.

"She has had two sinus infections and bronchitis this fall," LaFreniere said.

The race, which featured teams from all divisions across New England, was won by nationally ranked Providence who totalled 21 points. Dartmouth finished second with 57 points, and Brown finished third with 75 points.

Rounding out the top five were Boston University with 155 points, and Vermont with 226 points. UMass finished with 246 points.

Perhaps of most interest was that UMass finished ahead of Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island. Rhode Island, who before the race was ranked number one in the A–10, finished in tenth place.

"Rhode Island did not run a good race, and I know their coach is disappointed by it," LaFreniere said.
